Now, Mr. President, this bill refers in no way to life, liberty, or property. No suggestion has been made that any one within a State is deprived of either, or that this act is intended to remedy any such legislation by any State. The act must be intended to enforce the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the United States, withheld from such citizen by some State law, and if the matters pointed out in this bill shall be shown to be privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, that is to say, privileges and immunities which belong to them because of such citizenship, then we can see there may be justification for this proceeding on the part of Congress. To put my proposition in plain words, if the privilege of entering an inn in the State of Pennsylvania or of entering upon a steamboat or a railway chartered by the laws of that State, or of entering a theater or a concert hall or any place of amusement in the State of Pennsylvania—privileges, conveniences, or pleasures, which have their existence within that State by virtue of the laws of that State anp cannot have existence beyond the boundary of that State simply because the laws of the State cease to have power beyond the State limits—if it can be shown that the fact of my right in Pennsylvania to purchase a ticket to enter a theater or to obtain accommodation at a hotel is a privilege and immunity by reason of my citizenship of the United States, and that the Government is bound to protect me in that under the fourteenth amendment, then there may be warrant for this bill. But what power did this amendment mean to confer on Congress? Did it mean to give the United States power to protect citizens in their rights as citizens of the United States, or did it go further and propose to protect them in their rights as citizens of the State? There is the precise line. There are certain rights and privileges belonging to citizens of the United States—long and well known and defined—but there are innumerable other rights and privileges derived from the State laws and regulations and enjoyed in right of citizenship of a State, and not by virtue of Federal citizenship. If the Government of the United States has the power to enter a State and take control of that vast domain of rights under the State regulation which a citizen acquires by virtue of the State laws which are regulated by the State, which are conferred by the State, which heretofore always in the history of this Government have been protected by the State, and the State alone—if the United States can assume guardianship of all those, then the State laws and the State governments are absolutely worse than useless; they are mere laughing-stocks existing only at the pleasure of Congress and the Executive, liable to be disturbed, modified, or overthrown as pleasure or caprice shall dictate without regard to State constitutions or supposed reservations of power in the States or the people.

This is no extreme view of mine. It has been distinctly proclaimed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and as I understand it every judge who has passed upon this question, whether concurring in the opinion of the court or dissenting because of his refusal to apply the principle to the particular case in question, has nevertheless agreed in recognizing the distinction I have referred to and its necessary effect. Let me read the language of Mr. Justice Miller in 1873 in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house case:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that, up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other exceptions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation; but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

The same declaration in substance is repeated in the dissenting opinion delivered in the case, and I do not understand these doctrines to be denied by any member of the Supreme Court. The question in the case then under consideration was in the application of the doctrine to the facts then before the court; a majority being of opinion the "rights and privileges" involved in the consideration were not those pertaining to the plaintiffs in error as citizens of the United States, but were left solely to the jurisdiction and control of the State constitution and laws of Louisiana, and some of the judges dissenting on that issue. The court moderately stated that it would radically change the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people if a different construction were admitted and the whole domain of the State control of internal affairs was handed over to the will of Congress. Why, sir, it would give to Congress a veto on every act of every State Legislature, and it would be far better at once to save the useless trouble and expense of the State governments and allow the entire legislation, local and general, of the thirty-seven States to be conducted in these two Houses of Congress. But, as I said, all the judges agreed as to the proper domain of the State and the Federal governments. Mr. Justice Swayne, delivering his dissenting opinion in the same case, says:

> The citizen of a State has the same fundamental rights as a citizen of the United States, and also certain others, local in their character, arising from his relation to the State, and in addition, those which belong to the citizen of the United States, he being in that relation also. There may thus be a double citizenship, each having some rights peculiar to itself. It is only over those which belong to the citizens of the United States that the category here in question throws the shield of its protection. All those which belong to the citizen of a State, except as to bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, are left to the guardianship of the bills of rights, constitutions, and laws of the States respectively. Those rights may all be enjoyed in every State by the citizens of every other State by virtue of clause 2, section 4, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States as it was originally framed. This section does not in anywise affect them; such was not its purpose.

I could read the dissenting opinions of other judges, showing that they all concur in the principle in the case then before them. Some of them considered that there was a violation by a law of Louisiana of the fundamental rights and immunities and privileges which belong to citizens as citizens of the United States, those "immunities and the privileges" which the original Constitution secured and which had been theretofore defined by Mr. Justice Washington in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, and whose definition had been accepted from that day to this, and is cited in the very case from which I read, and is found later in a case decided in 1873, in 17 Wallace, The Railroad vs. Burnell. Soon after the Slaughter-house cases came the case of Bradwell vs. The State, where a woman proposed to test her right and privilege to be admitted to practice law in the courts of the State of Illinois, which by the judgment of the supreme court of that State was refused her. She sued out a writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States upon that judgment, and it was ably and eloquently argued in her behalf by an advocate no less distinguished than the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] and no counsel appeared on the other side. The whole battery of the learning, the ingenuity, and the eloquence of that distinguished Senator of which we are constantly witnesses was displayed without a returning shot before that court; and yet there was a unanimous opinion adverse to her admission. In delivering the opinion, which was concurred in by every member, (Mr. Justice Bradley stating a different reason for the opinion,) the court said:

> We agree with him, (Mr. CARPENTER,) that there are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States in that relation and character, and that it is these and these alone which a State is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a State is not one of them. This right in no sense depends on citizenship of the United States. It has not, as far as we know, ever been made in any State or in any case to depend on citizenship at all. Certainly many prominent and distinguished lawyers have been admitted to practice, both in the State and Federal courts, who were not citizens of the United States or of any State. But on whatever basis this right may be placed, so far as it can have any relation to citizenship at all, it would seem that as to the courts of a State, it would relate to citizenship of the State and as to Federal courts, it would relate to citizenship of the United States.
> The opinion just delivered in the Slaughter-house cases renders elaborate argument in the present case unnecessary; for unless we are wholly and radically mistaken in the principles on which those cases are decided, the right to control and regulate the granting of license to practice law in the courts of a State is one of those powers which are not transferred for its protection to the Federal Government, and its exercise is in no manner governed or controlled by citizenship of the United States in the party seeking such license. (16 Wallace, 139.)

Again, there is a case which afterward arose at the October term, 1873, Bartemeyer vs. The State of Iowa; and the syllabus of the case, the whole meaning of the case, was that the fourteenth amendment does not interfere with the police powers of the State. Mr. Justice Bradley gave the opinion; Mr. Justice Field concurred. Mr. Justice Field was the judge who led the dissent, and chiefly expressed it, to the opinion of the court in the Slaughter-house cases, and therefore by some it might have been supposed that he differed with the doctrine laid down by the court in the decision of those cases, which excluded the Federal Government from any interference with the control of the rights of the citizens of a State in regard to those rights which belong to them otherwise than as citizens of the United States. But so far as the doctrine which I am contending for was concerned, the court were unanimous. Said Mr. Justice Field in the case of Bartemeyer in 1873:

> No one has ever pretended, that I aware of, that the fourteenth amendment interferes in any respect with the police power of the State. Certainly no one who desires to give to that amendment its legitimate operation has ever asserted for it any such effect. It was not adopted for any such purpose. The judges who dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court in the Slaughter-house cases never contended for any such position. But, on the contrary, they recognized the power of the State in its fullest extent, observing that it embraced all regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace, and safety of society, that all sorts of restrictions and burdens were imposed under it, and that when these were not in conflict with any constitutional prohibition or fundamental principles, they could not be successfully assailed in a judicial tribunal.

Mr. President, it would seem to me impossible in the face of such language as this, proceeding from a court entirely unanimous, that Senators could suppose such an act as we are now considering could stand for one instant the test of judicial criticism. The assumption of this bill is that under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, inhibiting a State from establishing or enforcing inequality, Congress has become the guardian of each individual in a State, can enter a State, control all its internal affairs in order to secure the enjoyment of each individual's supposed rights, and the constitution and laws of the State itself. Let us examine this category of the alleged rights, privileges, and immunities supposed to need congressional aid and warrant congressional interference for their maintenance and supervision. Hotels, public conveyances, and places of public amusement. What utter bathos, Mr. President, does this single paragraph which I read a while ago contain? The act is entitled "An act to protect all persons in their civil and legal rights," a scheme of government in a single line, with a preamble declaring that it is the duty of a government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all, of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political, and declaring the appropriate object of legislation to be to enact great fundamental principles into law;" and then we find such a terrible fall from so great a height of argument to daily hotel life, to every-day carriage in railways, to visits to theaters and concert halls, and these are gravely and sonorously proclaimed "fundamental principles," and full and equal enjoyment is enjoined.

Mr. President, how are these institutions of pleasure or convenience—the theater, the inn, the public railway, or steamboat—created? In every case by private means, sometimes by State aid, and oftentimes sustained by State acts of incorporation. There is not one that does not owe its existence to State law or custom, and which has its lawful existence only within a State, and subject to State law and regulation. Some States may tax them by requiring a license for hotels and theaters; others may not and do not; some may forbid them in toto; others may encourage them in the most liberal manner; but all are founded and conducted by private individual or corporate enterprise, not in any case I can now recall by a State as a State institution. Bear this in mind, for the fourteenth amendment is addressed entirely to States and never to people, and there seems to me to have been a very strange confusion in the minds of those who draughted this bill, under the fourteenth amendment, in referring to "nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political," when the fourteenth amendment contains no such language, and no reference to such subjects is to be found in any part of it. The fifteenth amendment relates only to the right to vote, and forbids any State to abridge that right by reason of "race, color, or previous condition," but the fourteenth amendment has no reference whatever to such subjects. There is not a word of sex or of race, of age or of color, of nativity or of religion—not a word in any way, express or implied, in the language of the amendment under which this statute is supposed to find its warrant.

It is difficult to comprehend the confusion of mind in which such a bill was conceived and matured—no wonder all constitutional limitations were disregarded or not perceived.

If there can be imagined any domestic institutions designed and used in the comfortable daily life of our people and now almost essential to society, surely they are our hotels, public conveyances, and theaters, which almost more than any others may be described as necessarily and peculiarly lying among the immense mass of legislative powers, which embrace everything in the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, which can be most advantageously exercised by the States. In searching for subjects peculiarly within the cognizance of State control one would at once select the identical institutions which are mentioned in this bill. If I wished to give examples of such matters as were especially and necessarily within the control of State regulations and laws, I would select these identical institutions which are now sought to be invaded by Federal law. To talk of their use and enjoyment as "fundamental rights" is simply to talk nonsense. To talk of them as rights belonging in any way or in any way flowing from a man's relation to the Government of the United States is equally absurd. If you wish to know their nature and necessary limitations, inquire into the source of their creation, what made them, what can unmake and destroy them, and do so lawfully? What is that? It is the power of the State in which these institutions are found. To the State's control, and necessarily to its protection and to its regulation, must be confided the rights or the privileges that flow from institutions created by its laws and by its laws alone. If the right grew from the Government of the United States, its laws can enforce and protect; but if the right has its root in the constitution and laws of a State, then to its source of existence alone can it look for enforcement and protection. Any other rule would throw our entire system of government into inextricable confusion.

The language I read just now describing this "immense mass of legislative powers, which embrace everything in the territory of a State," was used first by Chief Justice Marshall in 1824 in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and it has been cited by the Supreme Court of the United States with admiring acceptance from that day until this, and by every court in the country that has been called upon to pass upon questions defining the constitutional barriers of power between the States and the Federal Government.

Now, does it not appear too absurd, almost impossible, to imagine Congress gravely proposing that the great Federal Government of our Union shall be attending to the duties of a hotel clerk; that we shall be examining into the relative advantages and condition of the bed-rooms of an inn, or deliberating upon the measure of duty of the head waiter at a hotel, legislating so that equal enjoyment at the table d'hôte is given to the guests, or supervising the railway conductor, and taking care by law that he assigns equally good seats to all the passengers, or, assuming the functions of the theatrical manager or his usher, shall insist that he have always present in his mind the dignity and power of the great Government of the United States. No other illustration is needed to exhibit the absurdity of this bill than the mere suggestion to assign duties of such a nature to such a Government. It seems to me that when the Supreme Court of the United States shall be found sitting in grave judgment upon the mighty question whether A or B have had equal seats or equal comfort or equal enjoyment at a hotel or in their transportation, or in some theater where their idleness and pleasure may have led them, then the position will be so absurd that the case will be laughed out of court, even if there was no other way to get rid of it.

I do not know but that an amendment should be offered to this bill, providing not only that this equal enjoyment of hotels should be guaranteed by the United States, but that money should be appropriated to pay for the accommodation, the ticket of the railway, or for entrance to the theater from the Treasury of the United States, and that in default of the provision of such money an action should lie against the Treasurer to compel its payment with fine and imprisonment in case he should refuse. One would be just as much within the power of Congress as the other; and one, in my opinion, would meet just as much respect at the hands of the Supreme Court, when the case should go there, as the other; for impecuniosity is as much a condition under the fourteenth amendment as race or color, and entitled to the same protection. If these incorporations, enfranchised and created by the people of a State through their Legislature, can be taken from under the State control; if its places of public amusement can be removed beyond the regulations of its police power; if its licensed houses of public entertainment may not be regulated by its laws, what is there left of safety or peace or security in any neighborhood or any community in any State? Its most essential powers and duties will be gone, to use the language of the Supreme Court, which I have just read; the State will be fettered and degraded. Such is the language of Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court. He speaks of "the effect being to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character."

But the right of a man to go into an inn or into a rail-car or a theater or concert-room, whatever it may be, belongs to him as a citizen of a State and not as a citizen of the United States; and this is the law laid down by the Supreme Court. For the protection of a man's privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States he may look to the United States Government. When he comes to claim protection for his rights as a citizen of the State he must look to the State that granted those rights. There is the simple, precise meaning; the jurisdiction is thus well and clearly defined, and the safety and protection of our political system requires that it should not be confused.

This is stating simply and shortly the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the full view of which we are now to legislate. The doctrines which they have laid down when applied to the bill under consideration must make it clear in the mind of any unprejudiced man that there is no warrant under the fourteenth amendment to pass this highly penal and grossly unjust, cruel, and unnecessary measure. To justify such legislation under any construction of the Constitution, it will be necessary to declare that the privileges of using hotels created by individual means and enterprise within a State under the laws of a State or of public conveyances on land or by water within a State or places of public amusement within a State are not State institutions, but are Federal in their origin and nature.

Such legislation cannot be justified unless you can deny the truth that these business pursuits all originate under local laws and are naturally and necessarily regulated by State authority for State purposes, and are subject to the necessary police powers of the community in which they exist; otherwise it is the sheerest usurpation to attempt to interfere with the exercise of these pursuits by warrant of authority of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I suppose the majority of this Senate are committed to the passage of this act. When it was before us on another occasion it contained features more mischievous and cruel than we find in it now, which I am glad have been omitted from the present bill. I speak of the school clause, which would certainly have had the effect of breaking up the entire system of public education of the poorer classes throughout all those sections of country where the colored people exist in large numbers. For the sake of the colored people, for the sake of the whites, I would have deeply deplored any such legislation. I am thankful that we are not called upon to meet it in this bill.

But this bill, if it become a law, will never be sanctioned by public opinion or the sentiment of the people; it will not be sustained by the courts; and, as was once said of an invalid judgment of a court, it "will go forth without authority and will return without respect."

I do not comprehend altogether the motive for pressing such a measure, and I do not wish to impute motive unless it is very clear. I can see no good to be accomplished by this bill. I can see only new and increased heart-burnings and unkindnesses between those races whom every good man must wish to see at peace with each other in their relative spheres of life and usefulness. Litigation will be promoted and great loss and annoyance must ensue to those citizens whose means are embarked in the pursuits aimed at by the provisions of this bill. The honest business of the hotels and theaters will be injured by this mischievous act until judicial decisions shall bring peace and set it at rest.

I have had much encouragement of late in the belief that a more liberal and kinder tone and sense of justice was being aroused in the breasts of men of my own race toward the black men all over the country, by which their educational facilities were being increased, and by which a better understanding was being brought about between the races. I fear this bill will create causes of collision, of unkindness, and misunderstanding, in which pecuniary loss must occur to the white, with no benefit whatever to the black. The good sense of both parties may in some degree prevent it; but I trust such speedy decision of the courts will be had as to deprive this measure of the sting, and take from it all capacity for mischievous interference by those who are disposed to find profit and power in public disorders and contention. It is in the interest of this ill-omened class that this measure is devised and pressed. It will be found to be totally without benefit to any, but fruitful of annoyance and trouble to thousands.

Mr. President, there are many other views of this subject which I should have been disposed under other circumstances to have expressed to the Senate. The utter injustice, inequality, and inexpediency of this act; the absence of that wise, broad, and practical statesmanship which should mold our legislation could be easily demonstrated. We have had, however, a long and tedious session, by day and night, with the understanding that, after the remaining hours of this night afford us much-needed rest, we shall again resume the consideration of this question to-morrow. Other gentlemen may desire to express their views upon it, and therefore I shall leave the question.

There are many objections of a social nature which I should have proposed to state, but I have confined myself to what I am aware is a very imperfect statement of the legal and constitutional objections to the enactment of this bill. It required nothing original in argument. The simple citation of those doctrines which have been applied to cases entirely at one with that which we are now considering, leaves me in no doubt that the bill which we are considering has not a single constitutional feature; that it seeks to create a confusion between the lines of State and Federal authority fatal to good government, and which I trust will be set right by the courts when they shall have the opportunity.

I had intended to discuss the section invading the jury systems of the States, and would have desired to enlarge upon the importance of a sound jury system to every State, and of the great difficulties attending its regulation. But time forbids, and I know I speak to deaf ears in this Chamber. In deciding upon the right to practice law as a profession before State courts, the Supreme Court, in the case of Bradwell, to which I have referred, have certainly laid down the doctrine which excludes the supposed right to sit on juries from the category of those rights intended to be secured and protected by the Federal power under the fourteenth amendment; and I cannot doubt the result whenever this bill shall come before them. In that confidence, I will not prolong my remarks or weary myself or the attention of the Senate.

Republican Government in the South.

SPEECH OF HON. L. C. CARPENTER,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks which I shall submit to the House I do not propose to confine myself strictly to a discussion of the merits of this bill. The republicans of the South are looking anxiously to this Congress to enact legislation of some kind, whether it be by the passage of this bill or some other of like character, which shall give to them the right to live in that section secure in their lives and property. I believe this bill will accomplish this purpose, and for that reason I shall support it in all its provisions.

The question is not whether the writ of habeas corpus, which seems to be the great bugbear in this bill, shall be suspended in any of the States of this Union in a time of peace, but it is whether lawless bands of armed men shall ride at will from one State into another, setting at defiance all law, overawing the people, and establishing in certain sections of the country a reign of terror. This is the vital question to the people of the South; and unless some sort of legislation can be perfected by which such lawless organizations can be restrained, and punished when outrages are committed by them, the whole system of republican government is a failure.

Probably there has been no subject under discussion in this Chamber since the formation of this Government which has consumed so much of the public attention as has the question of "republican government in the Southern States." It is now nearly eight years since the first one went into operation in that section, and during all that time they have formed the chief topic for discussion, not only in Congress, but in the public prints, in the forum, in the pulpit, and on the hustings; until the people, misled by judiciously disseminated false information, have almost come to regard them as terrible monstrosities too outrageous to be tolerated, and too destructive to good morals and true government to be fostered or longer kept in existence. For the past three years the cry against these governments has been renewed with tenfold more fury and vehemence, until nearly all prominent journals in the country have been drawn into the democratic maelstrom, and have joined in the denunciation of governments of which they knew absolutely nothing, save what was gathered from sources interested in the spread of false information, or was derived from the letters of flying correspondents.

I need not go back to the foundation of these governments in the South, nor allude to the causes which made them possible, for all these facts are familiar to students of current history. Suffice it to say, they were the result of four years of bloody civil war and of legislation consequent thereon. A complete upheaval of society had taken place, old political landmarks became entirely obliterated, and a new condition of things became necessary from the changed status of a portion of the people of that section, which hitherto had been regarded as mere chattels forming no part whatever of the great body-politic. These people, suddenly elevated to citizenship, naturally turned to that party which had been instrumental in striking the shackles from their limbs, and cast their political fortunes with those who believed in the grand principles enunciated by Jefferson in the immortal Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

From this element was formed the basis of republicanism in the South, and with the loyal Union element of the white race, small in numbers but possessed of wonderful energy and vitality, the new party took possession of political affairs, molded new governments in consonance with the spirit of the Constitution of the country, adopted constitutions which guaranteed equal and exact justice to all men, legislated in the interest of all the people regardless of the terrible past, and sought to bring peace and prosperity to a section which had been convulsed and distracted by one of the most gigantic civil wars of which history gives any account. Not only were these governments republican in form but in fact.

The legislative records of the republican governments of the South may be examined with the closest scrutiny, and not a single act can be found which the most malignant ingenuity can torture into an act of persecution or revenge toward a class which, for more than a century, had held in bondage more galling than that of the galley-slave the very men who were now called upon to administer the affairs of government. Instead of driving the hitherto controlling political element of those States from the party, the most cordial invitations were extended to them to come in and assist in building up the new fabric; but these invitations were spurned with contempt by the leaders of the old régime, and instead of lending a helping hand to place the new government upon a solid foundation every possible obstacle was thrown in the way; men were traduced, abused, vilified, and treated with contempt for no other reason than that they were republicans. From the moment the first republican government went into operation in the South until now, they have met with nothing but the most determined opposition from the democracy. Even before a single act had been done by the republican government of South Carolina, or before even the newly-elected officers had been sworn into office, the most abusive and insulting articles appeared in the columns of the leading democratic journals of that State, attacking these officials in the most outrageous manner, not for what they had done, for as yet they had done nothing, but for what it was charged they would do.

The moneyed men of the North were appealed to to withhold support from a republican administration, the State credit was cried down by the very men who should have been anxious for its preservation, the people were openly advised not to pay taxes, and more than this, assassination of public officials was advocated by leading men in the democratic party as the surest method for ridding the State of the hated radicals. Yet in spite of all this factious and malignant opposition, and in spite of all efforts to break us down in the money markets of the world, our credit constantly appreciated, prosperity began to dawn upon us, and before one year had passed after the inauguration of a republican government in South Carolina the securities of the State stood second to but very few States of the Union. But the democracy never for a moment ceased its opposition. With redoubled energy they set to work to destroy our increasing influence, nor did they scruple as to the means by which that end was to be accomplished.

The history of elections in the South since 1868 is familiar to nearly every citizen throughout the length and breadth of the land. Outrages, whippings, tortures, and murders have been perpetrated to a fearful extent, in order to intimidate the newly made freemen and destroy republican majorities. The Ku-Klux, or Invisible Empire, with all its hellish machinery, set in operation by leading lights of the democracy, destroyed thousands of human beings, and committed outrages the mention of which would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of a Comanche Indian, and yet during all this period of persecution and murder, while leading republicans were being dragged from their beds at night and cruelly whipped, shot to death, or hanged to the nearest tree, while women were being ravished and outraged by these fiends incarnate, and little children burned to death in the lowly cabins of their unoffending and unfortunate parents, while the heavens were made lurid with the flames of burning dwellings lighted by the torch of midnight marauders, not a hand was raised in retaliation, although the republicans outnumbered their tormentors nearly two to one. History does not furnish another such instance of forbearance under persecution as this.

Sir, had these hellish outrages been perpetrated upon any other race of people than the negro, who can portray the terrible retribution which would have followed? For nearly three years this organized system of outrage, rapine, and murder prevailed in my State, and hundreds of victims to hate and political intolerance were hurried to untimely graves. And yet, sir, the records of that State will be searched in vain for a single act passed by a republican Legislature which can be construed into an act of a revengeful or retaliatory character.

What had a republican administration done to warrant such inhuman persecution as this? What act of legislation had been placed upon the statute-books which would justify the use of the bludgeon, the knife, and the pistol? Not one; and I defy the most malignant radical-hater in the country to point to a solitary act of legislation passed by the reconstructed Legislature of South Carolina which is not in accordance with the letter and the spirit both of the constitution of the State and of the United States. What had been done, then? I answer nothing which had not also been done in every other republican or democratic State in the Union. The only crime committed by these poor victims was that of working for the success of the republican party, and voting the republican ticket; and in every instance of murder and outrage in the South which has been brought to the attention of the public through the breaking up of the Ku-Klux and other kindred organizations, it has been shown conclusively that the victim was either a leading republican, or was so regarded by those who outraged him.

Is it strange, then, in view of all these difficulties that a greater measure of success did not follow the administration of governments in the South by the republican party? A lawless minority, bent on mischief, can prevent the complete success of the best system of government ever devised; and such a minority we have had actively at work in our midst for the past seven years or more. That this system of political persecution and intolerance was justified, or indorsed by the better class of democrats in the South I do not believe, but that they knew of it and even winked at some of the atrocities committed, I have no doubt. They were powerless to prevent these outrages for fear of persecution themselves, and thus the turbulent element in society dictated the party policy of great States, and for a time even bade defiance to the strong arm of the General Government. Under such constant persecution, it finally became a question with the better class of republicans, those anxious to build up a republican fabric which would be able to withstand the shock of ages, whether they should longer attempt to administer the affairs of government in presence of an element which defied all law and laughed to scorn the power of the State government. Good men hesitated longer to take their lives in their hands and attempt to carry on a government which at any moment was liable to topple down and bury them beneath its ruins.

No government can be eminently successful which does not obtain the hearty good-will and support of the governed. The republican governments of the South, although conducted in the spirit of fairness and for the best interest of all classes, never obtained the consent of one class of citizens, the large property-holders, although they had the support and confidence of a majority of the people. This support was withheld, not because of any act of oppression or abuse by republican administrations, but simply because these administrations were republican and the affairs of state were not administered by democrats.

No other people in the world have ever suffered half the odium, the reproach, the contumely, the persecution and abuse which has been heaped upon the republicans of the South during the past few years.

Democrats may arise in their places on this floor and talk about corruption, extravagance, and high taxation by republican governments in the South; they may abuse the poor downtrodden and persecuted colored man until the country rings with their denunciations, but they can never distract the attention of the civilized world from the well-established fact, that the democratic party perfected and put into operation what will be recorded in history as one of the most damnable conspiracies against human life and human freedom ever set on foot by any set of men or demons in any age of the world. Nor can they escape the responsibility for their terrible crimes by pouring out the vials of their wrath and fierce invective upon the devoted heads of the republicans. If the republican governments of the South increased taxation and squandered the public funds, or if officials dealt corruptly with their high positions, they did not organize murder and arson, and take the lives of men and women for no other reason than that their political opinions were obnoxious. Under such a system of terrorism the republican governments, one after another, succumbed and gave way, and the Bourbon democracy assumed the reins of government. Of the ten reconstructed States which once had republican governments but three now remain, Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina. One by one you have seen them slip from the grasp of the party, when it was well known by every intelligent man in the South that the republicans had a clear majority in every State, if it could only be brought to the polls and permitted to vote without fear of punishment. Why it cannot be brought out I have already shown. Treachery lost us two of the States, and when once lost the democracy takes good care to put it forever beyond our power to regain them.

How this is done may best be ascertained from the following letter, received by me from a prominent republican in Augusta, Georgia, dated January 3, 1875. Let it be borne in mind that Georgia is a democratic State, where everything is said to be peaceable and quiet since the reins of government have passed from republican into democratic hands. The name of the writer is withheld for obvious reasons:

SIR: During the congressional campaign of 1870 in what was then the fifth congressional district of Georgia, now the eighth, and at this time represented in Congress by Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, Colonel J. S. Fannin, an old and highly respected citizen of Georgia, a native of the State, and a lawyer of high standing who had frequently represented his county in the Legislature previous to the war, was the republican candidate for Representative in Congress. He and another republican speaker were advertised to speak in Washington, Wilkes County, the home of Robert Toombs. When the cars arrived in Washington upon which it was known that the speakers must come if they kept their appointment, a crowd of armed white democrats rushed into and through the cars and as they came out were heard to say, "They are not here," evidently referring to Colonel Fannin and his friend, who had missed the train, and were, therefore, not on the cars. Three colored men, and republicans, the leaders of the party in that county, were standing near the depot upon the arrival of the cars. After the crowd of white men above referred to came out of the cars, they commenced to shoot at the colored men. One, William Harris, the most influential republican in the county, was instantly murdered without provocation; another, William Ratley, was mortally wounded; and the third, Robert Washington, was seriously wounded, but escaped to the city of Augusta and reported the matter. No attempt has been made by the State authorities to punish the murderers of these republicans, although the crime was committed in the day-time, in a village of about two thousand inhabittants, and the murderers were well known to many citizens. When the superior court met next after the commission of these murders, Judge Andrews, the presiding judge, called the attention of the grand jury to the matter and charged them to investigate it, which they failed to do, although the facts could have been easily established and the guilty parties convicted. But very few republican votes were cast in that county at the next election, and since then the republican party has been completely disorganized, although there are a majority of republicans in the county.

In 1874, just before the opening of the campaign in the eighth congressional district of Georgia for the election of a Representative in Congress, an intelligent colored man and his two sons commenced to organize the republican party in Columbia County, which is near Wilkes County on one side and borders on Richmond County, in which is the city of Augusta, on the other. They were industrious men, working for themselves on a plantation which they rented. Soon after they commenced to organize the party a white democrat, claiming to be deputy sheriff, with a crowd of white men, claiming to be his posse, went to the plantation of these colored men and pretended to arrest them upon a warrant charging them with attempting to incite an insurrection. They were securely bound to prevent their escape, and taken in the direction of the court-house of the county. The white men were mounted, the colored men were on foot. A person who followed the crowd says that the colored men were taken about a mile from the plantation, into a ravine, in the woods, out of sight of houses, when they halted. The old colored man was taken a few feet from his sons and shot, murdered in cold blood, his body riddled with bullets, so that when he was afterward buried by his friends his clothes could not be removed, his body was so badly mangled. His sons were then, one at a time, in a similar manner murdered. A coroner's jury was summoned, but the verdict was, "justifiable homicide," because, as it was alleged by the murderers, the prisoners were attempting to escape when they were shot. As the "sheriff and his posse" were mounted on good horses and were known to be well armed, and the colored men were on foot and securely bound to prevent their escape, the verdict of the coroner's jury would seem to be a part of the same conspiracy. No further attempt was made to organize the republican party in that county, and, because of that and other crimes committed in that district, no republican candidate was nominated or supported for Representative in Congress, and the democratic candidate, Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, was elected without opposition.

"Peace" has been secured in Georgia as explained above.

In view of the condition of affairs as described in this letter, is it difficult to understand how the democracy retains control of the politics of the Southern States after they once get possession? This is by no means an isolated case. There are scores of them, as the committees of this body who have visited those sections have already testified.

A revolutionary mob in Arkansas overturns that State government, and Congress sees the bloody work go on without even entering a protest. Not only has it seen these revolutionary proceedings succeed, but now it is proposed to legalize them because, forsooth, there is peace in that State! Ay, there is peace there, but at what expense of human life was it obtained, and at what cost to human liberty is it proposed to perpetuate it! Does any gentleman upon this floor propose to insult the intelligence of the American people by telling them that the Garland government is a government of the people, for the people, and established by the people? I trust not. If that is a legal government, then, I ask, what is to prevent a lawless band of men in any State from forcibly overturning the existing government, calling a convention to make a constitution such as the conspirators desire, and setting up a government of the most approved White League pattern? If this outrage upon constitutional liberty is permitted to go unrebuked, and republican governments in the South are to be subverted and new ones established in their places because peace may be secured in that way, there is not a republican government in any southern State which will not, in my judgment, be subverted and destroyed in this manner before two years more have passed.

Gentlemen upon the other side talk of peace and quiet and good feeling in the South, and allege that if it were not for the "adventurers," as they call all republicans who were not born in the South, there would be no trouble whatever, but the utmost harmony and good feeling would prevail between the races. I beg to trespass upon the patience of the House to read an extract from a letter from a distinguished divine not unknown to many gentlemen upon this floor, Bishop Gilbert Haven. This letter was published in the New York Independent during the campaign of 1874, and gives a plain statement of affairs as they existed at that time. Bishop Haven says:

A striking difference between these two States (South Carolina and Georgia) is their car accommodations and conditions. The hideous holes into which colored men are stuffed in Georgia make their sitting in the regular car, as you enter South Carolina, the more noticeable. I got on the cars at Brunswick at two in the morning. Two brethren accompanied me—one a polished and well-dressed youth, on his way to the Presbyterian seminary at Charlotte, the other a respectable citizen of the place and the owner of quite a pretty property. They stepped into the car where I had my seat and took in a satchel and valise. As they came out the conductor said in very wrathful tones, "What are you in that car for?" "We went in to carry a bundle," they said, deprecatingly, and with crushed air and voice. They knew that was their only protection. "You've no business in that car at all, you ——," replies the gentlemanly conductor, for he was very gentlemanly to me. Yet he knew well they had a right to go in there to carry packages, and so his censure and his oath were alike uncalled for. But he was mad at the Christian treatment they were receiving at other hands, and so revealed his authority a little more than he might have otherwise done. This authority is, however, always revealed. I saw a Pullman conductor approach a colored gentleman of fine address and presence, who had stepped into the car to introduce me to a gentleman, in the same insolent manner and language, leaving out the profanity, with which this conductor assailed these gentlemen.

Our Brunswick conductor used a little more of his authority a few miles out. An old lady entered this car, cleanly and neatly dressed and retiring, but partly of the offensive hue, for she was well mixed with white. She sat with her face looking out of the rear window. He came to her last, and instantly ordered her to go forward, not even allowing her to wait until the cars stopped. So she had to stagger perilously across the chasm, the cars reeling badly. If she had fallen off he would not have been blamed by the press or the public. It is the third woman I have seen thus put out of the cars—the other two in Tennessee.

But the worst of it is that the cars into which they are thrust are hideous pens. I went forward, by permission of the conductor, (I could not have gone otherwise,) to see my friend and brother, the presiding elder of the Savannah district. He was in a dirty, ill-ventilated, close-packed, unswept car, as mean as mean could be. Yet he was paying first-class fare, and two score of seats in my clean car were vacant. But for him to have asked to occupy one would have brought a revolver against his head. And yet this man would pass for white in any community, and has often done so here. But if he is known as colored there is an end of his being treated as a gentleman.

Now see the difference. The first chief station after leaving Savannah for the North is Yemassee Junction, where the Beaufort and Augusta trains come in. Into our car came and sat General Robert Small, the famous pilot who run off the "Planter." Other like gentlemen and ladies took seats also. None of the Georgian gentry who were in the car were harmed by this contact. They accepted it as they accept it on the horse-cars everywhere in the South. Nothing improper in dress or bearing did these persons exhibit. But there was liberty and civil equality. This freedom lasts till you reach Chester, coming north. The next station of importance is Charlotte, North Carolina. There the last of these ladies and gentlemen leave the cars and no more enter them. That dirty car ahead is all they will now enjoy till they reach Richmond. Do you not say this abomination should be abolished? Is there not here a grand superiority of South Carolina over Georgia? Others exist more important even than the equality of cars and schools. Life is vastly safer in South Carolina than in Georgia.

Just now it is the fashion North to curse the carpet-bagger and praise the unreconstructed and defiant rebels. Some sad and awful surprises may teach the North the dreadful folly of such a course. In Middle and Southern Georgia, twenty miles from a railroad, a northern man's life would not be worth a sixpence. A few months ago a northerner residing in Southwestern Georgia, a former member of the Legislature, a postmaster, was killed, and the papers never noticed it. He had been sent out by the American Missionary Society. That was sin enough. A negro in Scriven County was hung up by a lawyer, doctor, and ex-representative, and received five hundred lashes, because he declined to plow a field for one of these gentlemen, and no paper even made mention of it. But four colored men are hung at Thomasville, not by a mob, but by the sheriff and governor, on a charge of which everybody believed that three at least were innocent. They lynch and hang these poor fellows out of sheer malice, because they cannot enslave them.

Does this letter show the harmony and good feeling toward republicans of the South of which we have heard so much? And whose fault is it that it does not prevail in Georgia? The democracy are in power there and have everything their own way; and still we are told that wherever the democrats are in authority in the Southern States there is peace and quiet and the utmost harmony and good feeling between the races. Yes, there is peace and quiet, but it is that sort of peace which is so vividly described in the foregoing extracts. It is a peace and quiet bred of terror and sustained by violence, intimidation, and by systematic persecution. A few of the leading men, terrified, persecuted, and awed into submission, and the balance are easily controlled and held in subjection.

The alleged abuses in the administration of government affairs by the republicans of the South have furnished a pretext for interference by force and violence. That these abuses were in great part purely imaginary is well known to every person who has taken the trouble to give these matters a careful, impartial investigation, for in almost every instance it has been found that whatever abuses did exist were brought about by the reckless action of individuals, and not by republicans as a party.

Mr. Speaker, I might perhaps have been content to stop here had it not been for some statements made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] the other night in regard to the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor; but, sir, I cannot permit those statements to go to the country uncontradicted. I quote from the printed remarks of the gentleman as they appear in the RECORD of the 12th instant:

Mr. BANNING. It will be observed that in those States where the democracy obtain control, such as Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Missouri, and Texas, we have peace, prosperity, and good order. No man is made afraid, and equal political rights are extended to all; while in those States that are under the despotism of republican politicians and the Army anarchy and outrage, hand in hand, shock the people of the United States.

A Southern State under control of the Administration, is a State where officials plunder with impunity, protected by the bayonets of the regular Army. Take, for instance, South Carolina. The retiring governor plundered the State on a taxation that amounted to confiscation, and while the debt was piled up in hopeless bankruptcy, there is nothing left to show in return but the enormous wealth and riotous living of shameless officials. Negroes, but lately field-hands, are made officials because they are negroes. All social restraints are swept away. Taxation is but another name for confiscation. To illustrate, I give the following statement:

Taxes and taxable property in South Carolina before and since the war.

The taxable property before the war was	$490,000,000
Taxable property in 1874	170,000,000
Taxes levied before the war	500,000
Taxes levied in 1873	2,700,000
Legislative expenses before the war	40,000
Legislative expenses, 1873	291,000
Public printing before the war	5,000
Public printing, 1873	450,000

And when the oppressed tax-payer of South Carolina came to Washington last winter for relief, he received no encouragement from the President, and his petition to Congress was referred to a committee, where it will sleep until adjournment on the 4th of next March. These tax-payers were white men and democrats. How different would have been their reception and the consideration of their petition had they been negroes and republicans I need not stop to say.

Mr. Speaker, the bayonets of the regular Army have not been used in South Carolina for any other purpose than to assist in arresting the miscreants who, in the darkness of midnight, disguised behind hideous masks, dragged unoffending men and women from their beds, hurried them to some lonely spot in the woods or to the nearest convenient tree, and there whipped, outraged, and frequently murdered them. Democrats in the disguise of Ku-Klux took the law into their own hands, rode unchallenged over the country at night upon their mission of plunder and bloodshed, until the bayonets of the regular Army were called into requisition to put an end to that democratic amusement. To this extent the bayonets of the regular Army have been used in South Carolina, and no further. No innocent man in that State has suffered either in his person or his property by the presence of the regular Army. The guilty wretches, acting under instructions from higher sources, who attempted to revolutionize the politics of a State through an organized system of pillage, robbery, arson, and murder, have reason to regret the presence of the United States troops; but none others have been harmed, nor have officials been protected in their attempts to plunder the State.

The gentleman must have drawn largely upon his imagination; for the facts of the case, as known to every intelligent man who has lived there, do not warrant any such assertions.

Sir, it is a libel upon the brave men who compose the Army of the United States to charge them with protecting public officials in plundering the people. The Army was sent into the South to protect human life against the murderous forays of armed bands of democrats; and even the bitterest, most malignant partisan in my State has made no such charge against it as was made by the gentleman from Ohio in the extract just quoted.

I desire now to call attention to another erroneous and mischievous assertion, "that all social restraints are swept away." Social ties in South Carolina are as strong to-day as they are in the great State of Ohio, and social privileges are no more abused than in the States of the North. But suppose the assertion were true, whose fault would it be? Is such an unfortunate condition of things the result of the past few years of republican rule, or is it the growth of a century? And who has controlled the political and social destinies of that State for the past century or more? But, sir the assertion is not true in any sense as applied to new South Carolina. How true it may be as applied to South Carolina of ante-bellum days, when traffic in human flesh and human souls was legalized by the votes of the democratic party, I shall not stop to inquire. It is enough for me to know that in every nook and corner of the State, in every hamlet and village, may still be found indisputable evidence of the laxity of social laws and the absence of social restraint. The African was fast bleaching into the fair-skinned Saxon, and had the old condition of things continued, the day could not have been far distant when the power to trace genealogy in that State would have been lost forever.

The figures in relation to the financial condition of my State, furnished by the gentleman from Ohio, are not unfamiliar to me. I have met them upon every stump in the State. They have been thrust before the public in every conceivable manner, not only by democratic speakers and journals, but even republicans have been misled into adopting them as correct and reliable. I do not object to the use of these figures, but I do object to the deductions usually drawn therefrom. These figures were adroitly prepared by a leading democrat of New York, Richard Lathers, and were incorporated in the proceedings of the tax-payers' convention which met in South Carolina in February, 1874. They represent the valuation of taxable property of the State before the war to be $490,000,000; taxable property now—$170,000,000; a difference of $320,000,000; and the impression sought to be conveyed is, that this apparent immense falling off in the valuation of property is solely attributable to bad government at the hands of the republicans in that State. Do our democratic friends not know that the great bulk of property in South Carolina before the war consisted of human chattels called slaves? And have they forgotten the fact that upward of four hundred thousand of these human beings held in bondage, subject to the will of the master like all other property, liable at any moment to be sold like sheep in the shambles, then constituted upward of three hundred millions of the property, of that State, all of which property was swept out of existence by the results of the war? But, sir, whatever may have been the valuation of property in that State before the war, that valuation never formed the basis of taxation, as the valuation of property there does to-day. The great bulk of the property, as I have already shown, was in slaves, and these were not taxed according to their value, but per capita, from fifteen to seventy-five cents each, while the free negro paid a per capita tax of from three to six dollars. A slave-holder owning one hundred slaves, valued at $800 each, would pay a tax to the State of from fifteen to seventy-five dollars, while a commercial man, doing a business upon a capital equal to that invested by the slave-owner in negroes, would pay a tax of 1 per cent., or from eight to sixteen hundred dollars per annum.

The revenues of the State before the war were chiefly derived from a tax upon the industries, while the rich land-owner paid next to no tax at all. Now all this is changed, and the revenues are derived solely from a tax upon the entire property of the State and not upon its industries. That the expenses of the State government have largely increased over those paid before the war no one will deny, but this is consequent upon the changed condition of things. Prior to the war there were but three hundred thousand citizens in the State who were any expense to the government. The slave was no more a charge or expense to the State than were the horses or cattle of the planter. Now we have nearly eight hundred thousand citizens to be governed, or more than double the number of citizens in the State before the war. The appropriations for the expenses of the State government during the fiscal year 1859–'60 were $618,231, or an expense to the State for each citizen of $2.05. The appropriations for the same purpose during the fiscal year 1872–'73 were $1,184,876, costing the State for each individual citizen $1.67. It will thus be seen that during the year of democratic rule, when the government was in the hands of constitutional patriots, the expense to the State to govern each citizen was $2.05, while under republican rule the cost to the State to govern each citizen was only $1.67, or 38 cents per capita in favor of republican administration. So much for that.

The following carefully prepared table, compiled from the public records of the State, shows the expenses of the State government for nine years prior to the war, exclusive of the interest upon the public debt, which was paid by the Bank of the State, an institution chartered by the General Assembly, with exclusive privileges to do a banking business for the entire State. A debt created by this pet institution, amounting to nearly $5,000,000, has been handed down to new South Carolina as a legacy from the democracy of former days:

Expenditures of the State government of South Carolina for nine years prior to the war.

1853–'54	533,123 20
1854–'55	484,883 29
1855–'56	591,145 98
1856–'57	608,294 85
1857–'58	1,036,924 39
1859–'60	967,968 57

It has been asserted here that taxation in South Carolina prior to the war was about $500,000. If that assertion be true, how was it possible to run the State government when its annual expenditures, as shown by the foregoing table, far exceeded that amount? But the assertion is not true, as has been clearly demonstrated. What I have already said of the State government of South Carolina, now recognized by both parties to be as good as there is in any State in the Union, may be also said of nearly every other republican government in the Southern States. That bad men have crept into office, and have abused the high trusts confided to their care, no one will deny, but this state of things is not peculiar to the South alone, nor does it apply exclusively to republican officials.

The republicans of the South desire peace and quiet, and have anxiously looked for that time when an era of harmony and good feeling would prevail between all parties. But, sir, they do not desire peace and quiet at the expense of every sacred right to which an American citizen is entitled. Give us peace and quiet based upon law and order and obedience to constituted authority, and let the harmony and good feeling which is to prevail be of that character which guarantees to every citizen of the Republic, whatever may have been the circumstances of his birth, or whatever may be the color of his skin, the right to a free expression of his opinions and a free use of the rights with which he has been endowed by an allwise Creator.

The republican party of this great nation owes it to the people of the South, who have stood by its banner during the trying times of reconstruction, to secure them in their lives and property, and to extend over the weak and defenseless the strong arm of the Government which owes its preservation to the party now administering its affairs. We ask nothing but justice and fair treatment, and we shall be content with nothing less. Secure to us governments republican in form and in fact; make human life secure beyond the mere will of a lawless minority, and such an era of good feeling and harmony between the races will settle over that country as has never been known there since the foundation of this Republic.

Force now the Rule—No more Needed.

SPEECH OF HON. E. K. WILSON,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, in the whole range of history it would be difficult to find a people more pitiable in their condition, or under a continuation of present rule more hopeless in their prospects, than the white inhabitants of some of our Southern States. To men like them, whose great pride and glory it has been to be free, it must have been a horrible fate to be subjected to a conqueror, stripped of property, prosperity, and self-rule, and handed over to the tender mercies of military sway. But a fate so sad as this, which has always seemed to a proud and sensitive people as the very depth of human misery, was but a stage in the descent to the unutterable woe which is the dread doom of some of our southern brethren. So crushing is the system which your reconstruction process has imposed upon some of the Southern States that, in the very agony of their sufferings, men who were born free and who have lived in utter horror of military rule, have cried out to you northern men in mercy to give them martial law, with no restraining power but the public sentiment of your people, rather than those disgusting caricatures of government, whose very basis is ignorance, whose normal state is disorganization, and whose very existence means plunder.

In some of these States the colored element preponderates, while in others it is so numerous that a few whites combined with it can control. In these States your reconstruction policy committed the fate of republican institutions to the guardianship of the African race. To a people snatched by your ancestors from the almost brutish barbarism of Africa, with no other training than that state of slavery, in which your fathers placed them and which you have always denounced as the hot-bed of vice and barbarism you delegated the keeping of free institutions, under a system of government which the plainest axioms of political science teach can only coexist with the virtue and intelligence of the citizen. By your speeches in Congress, by your party press, and by your unscrupulous agents in the South, you compacted the freedmen into a solid political phalanx, persistently representing their former masters as their natural enemies, who were only waiting a chance to deprive them of every political and civil right and to fetter their limbs again in slavery. By every cunning device and political appliance you have arrayed race against race. Thus in those unhappy States you subject intelligence to the rule of ignorance, refinement to the rule of brutishness, virtue to the rule of vice, property to the rule of greed, and civilization to the rule of barbarism. And you do more: you accomplish a purpose over which you seem to gloat as though it were the very height of justice, the very perfection of moral grandeur. You who so unsparingly denounced in others the childish feeling of prejudice, instigated by an undying prejudice against a fallen foe, accomplish a feat which no age, nation, or country has ever before witnessed—you place a race of proud, refined, high-spirited, and liberty-loving white men like yourselves under the rule of those who were but yesterday their slaves and domestics, of a different and alien people, led and goaded on by white men who add to all the bitterness of political partisanship the inappeasable hatred of renegades to their race.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the unhappy condition to which your policy has brought once proud and prosperous Southern States, and especially the State of Louisiana. But sad and pitiable as is their present condition, it is not that of which they complain. Unparalleled as are their sufferings, with elements of horror never before presented in the vast records of human misery, they would manfully breast it all if you would but leave them the last refuge of the miserable—the hope of bettering their condition. Their cry is that you will not let them alone in their deep affliction to work out as best they can their own salvation. By the irreversible laws of nature, even as population is distributed in Louisiana, intelligence was bound in the end to dominate over ignorance, and property to assert its legitimate influence over public affairs. As time went on and the freedmen became assured by continued enjoyment of his freedom and the fruits of inevitable misgovernment ripened and fell in poisonous profusion upon all classes of her citizens, it would soon be seen and felt that those only who had the brains and the interests of property could properly rule the State.

The former slave, who, apart from his jealousy of his freedom, has none of that personal dislike of his former owner which northern men, in their total ignorance of southern society, imagine to exist, would soon again lean for support and counsel upon his old master, who owns the land on which he lives and pays the wages upon which he feeds. Soon, too, would faction do its work, and divide a party officered, as was this negro party, by selfish and designing men. Such in a few years was the history of most of the Southern States; and finally in 1872 such became the condition of things in reconstructed Louisiana. There a considerable part of the republicans, led by a republican governor and cheered on by the clarion voice of the eloquent Sheridan, fought side by side with the democrats to redeem the State from the rule of ignorance and rapacity. They gained a victory which Federal interference transformed into a disastrous defeat, resulting in the re-establishment of African sway propped up by military despotism. You condemn the mode of this Federal interposition and denounce its guilty agents, but never move a step to undo their infamous acts. You pretend to pillory some of your vile instruments, but take care to reap the full harvest springing from their crimes. Such has always been the policy of arbitrary power.

Mr. Speaker, a republican high in position, formerly a trusted member of the President's Cabinet, has lately announced upon a high forum that "if the President were disposed to leave the control of the South to the white race, the Government (i. e., the Administration) would be overthrown before the close of the present term." Here is an amazing assumption of more than imperial powers for the President, and a plain intimation that those powers must be used to crush out the white race, reimpose upon them negro rule, and thereby save his party, which alone is entitled to possession of the Government. It is the first time the doctrine has been formulated and openly proclaimed; but I will show it is one the President has been acting on for years. Sir, no fair-minded man can doubt that the conservatives of Louisiana gained a victory in 1872 and were entitled to reap its fruits. When their enemies have gathered volumes of testimony in their favor, and have made powerful arguments confirmatory of their rights, beyond controversey their case must be good.

Partisanship rarely permits its victim to become a witness and advocate for an opponent. When so rare an exhibition is made, the act of an adversary thus converted into a defender becomes invested with tenfold weight. The republicans who bear testimony against Kellogg and his government are almost numberless. A republican committee in the Senate, all able and leading men, have unanimously reported that the republican board, styled the Lynch board, even if legally constituted, as a majority of them deny, had no earthly power to throw out any returns except those accompanied by charges of fraud, violence, or corruption; and that if all returns thus excepted to are discarded, the conservatives would still have a majority. This House has not dared to validate the election at large in that State in 1872 as a republican victory by seating Pinchback, while your committee on Elections has decided against him. The Senate has for two long years refused to acknowledge the certificate of Kellogg as governor by seating that eminent statesman. The President himself, while seating Kellogg and his Legislature, candidly admits that he is not certain of their election. And still, while no one can be found weak or base enough to assert that these creatures of fraud and violence were elected, they are found wielding all the powers of government and ruling over a subjugated people; because "the South must not be left to the control of the white race."

And on the other hand, sir, McEnery and his friends are ruled out, not because any frauds are legally proved, but are rather imagined to have occurred. Able republican lawyers high in position have declared that if there was any legal returning board in Louisiana in 1872 it was the De Feriet board, which by actual canvass verified the conservative majorities, averaging over 10,000 votes. One of the ablest and best-informed republicans on that Senate committee, while he asserts the election of McEnery to have been void for fraud, expressly states that if that election were tested in a court of law upon principles of law, it must be sustained, and McEnery can only be thrown out upon the ground that Warmoth possessed and wielded in his favor the election machinery of the State, and the guess that this machinery was worth 20,000 votes to him, not as proved by witnesses, says this republican lawyer, but as deduced from the vast powers centered by a republican Legislature in a republican governor for party purposes, and which it is supposed he used for his conservative allies just as they were intended to be used to perpetuate the rule of oppression and plunder. Upon such flimsy premises the President bases his conclusion in his late message on the Louisiana case that McEnery was elected by fraud. Anxious as he was to assert the verity of Kellogg's election, he dared not do it. Doubly anxious as he was to assert and prove the defeat of McEnery to clear his own skirts of an unparalleled outrage, he can only charge that Warmoth used in favor of McEnery that autocratic power which a republican Legislature had without rebuke conferred upon him to insure the success of Kellogg, and that what would have been a venial fault in behalf of a friend of the President becomes a deadly crime when done for his enemy.

Most beautifully falls the argument from the lips of a President, who wields in the interests of party the appointment of eighty thousand office-holders, with unknown thousands of laborers in navy and dock yards, and sends forth hosts of marshals and supervisors swarming over the land, and uses the Army to patrol the country, arresting, imprisoning, and terrorizing over voters; and not content with that, asks for the powers of a dictator, so that he may crush out all opposition to his will. All these frightful appliances have been and are expected to be worth hundreds of thousands of votes to the President's party; and if we were to draw from them the charge of fraud vitiating and annulling elections, we would be laughed at as the veriest simpletons. And still that is the substance of the President's argument against the election of McEnery, upon which alone he predicates the support of the infamous judicial fraud and usurpation perpetrated by a degraded creature, who for the first time in our history was seduced by republican politicians to prostitute the judiciary to the use of wicked political conspirators. Vile as is Durell in the sight of all honest men, those who used him as a weak and supple tool, whether they sit in high places in Washington or New Orleans, have well earned and will ever bear a double load of infamy. Strong indeed must be the resolve not "to leave the South to the control of the white race," when it stoops to corrupting the judiciary as a means.

A distinguished republican judge has pronounced this act of Durell's as "without the shadow of authority, in defiance of law, and therefore supported by no presumption of correct motives." And still this act was a necessary, preconcerted part of the conspiracy by which the government of Warmoth, existing both de facto and de jure, was to be overthrown, and one the President will not dare to say was elected was to be inaugurated. The President seeks to escape from direct responsibility for this foul act by telling us "that it was only made known to him that process of the United States court was resisted." Sir, no man can read the whole list of dispatches developing this conspiracy to overthrow Warmoth and not feel certain that one member of his Cabinet at least knew, approved, and directed the whole machinery. If General Grant did not know and approve it, it must have been only because he utterly delegated to a subordinate the trifling matters of pulling down and setting up State governments by the criminal use of Federal judges and armies.

If Grant and Emory, being military men, did not know the alphabet of law, Mr. Attorney-General knew full well that the fixed purpose of installing Kellogg could not be effected without a fraudulent attempt by a Federal judge to decide by a void decree which was and which was not the Legislature of the State. And when the order was issued to Marshal Packard to use the Army to execute any decree of Durell's, it was the deliberate purpose of this Cabinet officer to use the military power of the country to shield the guilty conspirators, and for mere partisan purposes to crown their efforts at fraud and usurpation with success. And when the President afterward indorsed this man by a nomination to the highest judicial office in the land, when he rebukes no actor in this disgraceful scene, when he nerves his executive arm to bolster up a judicial outrage and usurpation which can find no defenders, when he hastens with eager zeal to reap every possible partisan advantage from it, when he aids to overthrow a State Government intrenched behind every muniment of title in favor of one which he will not even now say was elected—if we can by any possibility clear him of prior complicity, we must hold him responsible as the principal whose approved agents perpetrated all these unparalleled crimes. And we must be permitted to say that we cannot admire the ingenuousness of that principal who, while approving and adopting every act of a subordinate, seeks to escape from the responsibility of having specially authorized these acts before they transpired.

Whatever the truth may be in this matter is utterly immaterial. One thing is certain: If Kellogg and Durell had not known that Federal power was at their back, that order would have never been passed; McEnery and his Legislature would have been quietly installed in power; the intelligence and property of the State, which are alone competent to direct its affairs, would have been for years shaping its destinies; the subsequent disgraceful and deplorable scenes would have been avoided; peace and order, such as prevail in other Southern States, would have reigned; and many acts of military violence and usurpation would not have disgraced our civilization and have become precedents in what threatens to be the fearful tragedy of the murder of constitutional liberty.

Thus, sir, in order to seat Kellogg, a judge committed a shameful fraud, which an Attorney General, by some strange jumble of functions lent the Army to consummate. And as soon as this creature of fraud and violence was duly seated, we see our President eagerly hastening to throw the mantle of his approval over his guilty shoulders, snubbing all remonstrants, and spurning all argument. And henceforth William Pitt Kellogg stands forth in all the infamy of a de facto governor, who, although he has no shadow of title in law, is as immovable as Mount Atlas, simply because the President, in the plenitude of his prerogatives, has clothed him with the panoply of executive recognition. A popular revolution may drive a Stuart from his throne or cost a Bourbon his head; but a governor de facto, with a President behind him, can bid defiance to the world and laugh his people to scorn. A court may err and retrace its steps. A Congress may enact an unwholesome law and repeal it; but a governor de facto, once recognized by the sovereign arbiter of the destinies of States, although not even claimed to be elected, becomes a Gibraltar, upon which all argument, all popular revolutions, and all elections of the people will break in vain. No poverty of title, no crimes that stain his seizure of power, no grinding oppression in the past, no certainty of a criminal perpetuation of his power, can justify the raising of a hand to overthrow this governmental puppet. Without the President's imprimatur, he is less than nothing. With it he is the strongest ruler in the world. He is backed by the power of forty millions of people to rule seven hundred thousand. He can invoke the aid of thirty-seven States to rule one. It is impossible that any people so situated can throw off a usurpation. It becomes legitimated by Federal recognition, and impregnably lodged in the citadel of Federal power. And our form of government, instead of being the shrine of freedom, is thus turned into an engine for the perpetuation of tyranny. The de facto usurper, under the wing of an overshadowing power, can safely concoct every villainous plot to prolong his reign.

And such, sir, has literally been the course of Kellogg during his usurpation. After two years or more of tyranny and wrong, the enslaved white people of that State fought another political battle, not so much to recover political power as freedom from plunder and misrule. They wanted a government by those who knew how to rule and who had an interest prompting them to rule aright. No fair mind can doubt that they again won the victory and have again been robbed of its fruits by fraud and its twin agency, military violence. Such is the unanimous verdict of your committee, consisting of five republicans and two democrats. I will not therefore attempt to prove what is conceded, that the acts of the returning board in that State last fall were illegal; but I will show that the conduct of that board was so flagrantly lawless, so shamelessly fraudulent, that it was their plain purpose to cheat the people of the State out of their chosen representatives, and that they were simply a band of political conspirators in the garb of public officials, who felt themselves backed up by the hand of power to perpetrate outrages which otherwise they would have not dared to project. It was the old scene of 1872 re-enacted with a slight change in the actors. In 1872 the instrument of fraud was a judge; in 1874 it was a returning board. It was as bold, defiant, and unblushing in the one case as the other; and each equally required and received the agency of military force to carry it on to consummation.

It was decreed in the beginning that this board should save Kellogg and defeat the will of the people. These five men of that board, without legal power or physical force themselves, would have never dared to defy all law and trample upon the rights of a whole people, without authority from some higher source than even Kellogg—himself a helpless minion of power. There must have been somewhere some secret tribunal, some gloomy Vehmgericht, from which issued fiats big with the destiny of States, and whose executive black priest was an Attorney-General of the United States. At any rate it was significantly given out at Washington that the decisions of this board, no matter what they might be, would be sustained. Just so the military was pledged to Durell to enforce any decree, however unlawful and revolutionary. Eager and prompt are ever the proffers of force; contemptuously indifferent are these wielders of military power as to the occasions for its use. With this corrupt invitation to make a corrupt canvass, this board met. A special tribunal, with well-defined duties, it could not advance one step beyond the strict limits prescribed by law. If it did, its acts were simply void. With respect to those parishes from which the supervisors and judges of election sent no charges of fraud, violence, or intimidation, their duty was simply ministerial and clerical. They had only to count and tabulate, and return the parties having majorities. With respect to the parishes from which such charges came they had quasi-judicial functions, could take testimony, and could in their discretion throw out the returns from those parishes.

But, sir, so quiet and orderly were the elections, that the partisan zeal of republican officers could not find occasion to prefer such charges but in three instances. These were not rejected, as the law required, but counted for the republicans. But the conservatives still had a large majority of the house of representatives, which it was the deliberate purpose to destroy. Then commenced the work of bold and shameless usurpation by these minions of power. In utter contempt of the law under which they professed to act, they assumed the terrible power to pronounce upon the election in every parish in the State, to invite partisan objections to returns before a body known to be organized in favor of the objector, and thus to exercise the highest prerogative of a legislative body to judge of the returns of its own members. It was an utter destruction of the right of the people to choose their own legislators, and the investment of a body of five men, chosen by an outgoing senate, with the power to choose the constituent elements of an incoming Legislature, and thus to continue one party in power forever.

But, Mr. Speaker, not content with usurping this dangerous power, which the Senate committee have unanimously decided they did not possess, and which no lawyer has ever claimed for them, this board shamelessly proceeded to disregard all justice, decency, and law in their decisions. No matter though republican judges and supervisors of election had certified to the fairness of registrations and elections, no matter though the republican candidate had borne honorable testimony to his competitor's success, and refused to take a step toward a contest, this inexorable board, in its fell purpose of manufacturing a party majority, made contests where none existed, raised up contestants out of men submissive to their fate, and then without evidence arbitrarily ejected the choice of the people, and returned men who did not even claim their seats. In many instances, as related by your own committee, these tools of lawless power and partisan fury, without evidence or against evidence, unseated and seated members of the Legislature in defiance of all law and decency. But after all the conservatives were still in a majority, and these conspirators were forced to resort to the transparent device of simply refusing to return five conservatives against whose election no question had been or could be raised, so that not being returned to the secretary of state that officer might not place their names on the list of members to be sent to the clerk of the house, and they might thus be debarred from participating in the organization of the house, which would thereby be placed, by a majority of two or three, in the hands of the republicans to organize as they pleased.

Thus was this conspiracy of Federal and Louisiana officials to commit "a gigantic fraud" brought to the close of its first shameful chapter. But, left unaided, it was still impotent for harm. It now remained for the Administration to perform its pledge to sustain the acts of the returning board, however lawless and despotic they might be. And although the President in his Louisiana message declares that "he has no desire to have United States troops interfere in the domestic affairs" of that State, yet by some strange fatality they are always there ready, not to overthrow armed rebellion or insurrection, or even to suppress domestic violence, but to place the capstone upon some work of fraud and usurpation which Federal and State officials have conspired to erect, but which without the President's aid and protection they cannot execute. In this case the shameless frauds in the board's proceedings were known the country over, and nowhere better than in Washington. There was no insurrection in Louisiana, and none was expected unless it should arise from what your committee denominate "the arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action of this board." The Army was there, then, lent to Kellogg, and a Lieutenant-General was also sent there, with all the laurels of war clustering around him and disarming adverse criticism, and also lent to Kellogg, not to suppress insurrection, but to prolong his usurped power and to that end to sustain the lying, fraudulent returns of this vile board, however they might be resisted. The form resistance took was not war, not even violence—except in the distempered brains of hot partisans—but an attempt on the part of the conservatives to organize the Legislature with the aid of these five delegates, whose election was too clear to be doubted even by reckless conspirators, and whose names could only by a clumsy trick involving palpable perjury be kept from the roll of members sent to the clerk of the house. The only barrier to the right of these five men to their seats in the house was the fraud and perjury of five other men, who were not even judges of their rights, but mere ministerial officers, arbitrarily and criminally refusing to do their sworn duty. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it was to help a disgusting fraud like this, that the proud soldiery of the country were lent by the President to a profligate usurper, and were marched, not against an armed foe, but into the legislative hall of a coequal and co-ordinate State, to drag out five peaceable civilians whose right to their seats was as perfect in all points of substantial law as is yours to that chair.

Let it not be said, then, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution and laws of our country have been broken in the interests of law and order. Before 1872 it was always held that the President could not intervene by armed force in the domestic affairs of a State, unless the governor or Legislature of that State, in case of insurrection, demanded his aid. In this case there was no insurrection, nor anything even approaching that domestic violence in its loosest sense which modern apologists for executive usurpations claim as a sufficient ground of interposition. The President and his apologists alike concede that no case had arisen under Federal laws for using the Army in State affairs, but place his defense upon his good motives, which prompted him to aid in the execution of State laws. Never was a bad cause worse defended. It is simply a preposterous pretense to say that the President is aiding in the maintenance of law when he lends his aid to perjured State officials to cheat representatives out of their seats and the people out of their representatives; when he is helping to trample out the very life and substance of law, and only to preserve its empty shell. I aver, sir, that no possible case can be conceived in which the use of the Army could be more unjustifiable. Nor can the President clear his skirts of the grave responsibility attaching to him by alleging that he had only lent the Army to his nondescript de facto governor to be used as the emergencies of his case might require, just as an old German prince would have loaned or hired his regiments to a neighboring potentate, to be used as his whim or interests might dictate. Such a position involves the double error of using the Army in a way and for a purpose never contemplated under our system, and also of delegating to another man, who is not even a member of his Administration, the most delicate duty intrusted by our Constitution and laws to the President himself—a duty ever inviting to usurpation and pregnant with destruction to the States, unless discharged with impartial justice and patriotism.

In very truth, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have ever seen a sentence in my life more replete with errors than the one in the President's late Louisiana message, in which he claims "that if he has committed any errors by the use of the military in these matters it has always been on the side of the preservation of order, the maintenance of law, and the protection of life." What law, I pray, State or Federal, did he maintain when he marched his troops to sustain a decree which has earned universal execration and swift impeachment for its author? What law did he not violate, when in spite of the legal governor and unasked by any Legislature, when no violence even threatened, he sent soldiers to guard the entrance to a State-house and to organize a Legislature which should illegally depose a bona fide governor, set up a pretender in his place, and pour out upon that unhappy State a deadly tempest of woes? What law did he uphold when he abused the military power of the country to drive peaceable men from their seats in a Legislature merely because certain ministerial officers refused to do their sworn duty? When cannot the Army be used to dominate over States, if it can be used without rebuke to trample upon the vital substance of laws under the plea of maintaining its empty forms? And how can good order be promoted by using armies to nullify State elections and overthrow State governments? It is indeed a novel doctrine that good order is to be preserved by teaching men to look to force and not to law for the source and the maintenance of government.

No policy could be more shallow or mischievous than that which encourages conspirators to pervert to the purposes of injustice and fraud the functions of judges and election officers in the hope of being sustained by armed force, and then claims the use of force in such a cause as the preservation of order. And, so far as the protection of life is concerned, it is an indisputable fact that it is secure in the Southern States in exact proportion as the Federal Government interferes least with its military arm. If you want life and property secure you must have a government of law and order, which you can never have while force is ever intervening to bring the reign of law into contempt and to give the effect of law to acts of gross perfidy and wrong on the part of high officials.

And above all, sir, if you want order and love of law, which mean security of life and property, you must have among the people respect for their rulers. This in the nature of things you can never have while the great mass of the people are forced to live under what they thoroughly believe to be a gross usurpation. A unanimous committee tell you such is the conviction of the people of Louisiana. They have a right to believe it. For if the military had not against all law and right been lent to the seating and upholding of Kellogg and his Legislature, the McEnery government, having the legal returns in their favor, and being recognized by the existing governor, would have been quietly installed in power, and the State, being then under the control of those who possessed the intelligence and the interests of property, would have had a guarantee of good government, which it can never have under the rule of greedy adventurers making tools of the freedmen. If the President really desired a government of law, order, and security in Louisiana, there was his initial and capital mistake. If he wanted to turn that unhappy State into what one of your committee calls "a hell on earth," the most perverse ingenuity could not have selected a shrewder plan. How could her people be otherwise than madly restive when they honestly believed that they had been robbed of the choice of their rulers, and that rulers had been imposed upon them by military power who would continue to plunder and harass them by oppressive legislation till their homes were confiscated and all hope destroyed?

Sir, men do sometimes become desperate in this world, even to the extent of rushing unbidden into the presence of their Creator. O, sir, these southern people are men, frail, erring men, but with all the instincts of freemen and an ardent love of liberty. They no more like to be trodden on than you do. How could you expect anything else than that they should make desperate efforts to recover the rights of self-government of which they felt themselves robbed, even to the extent of rushing upon the thick bosses of our mighty President's buckler? Who could have reasonably expected that riots would not occur, or even a more widespread effort to throw off the yoke of their oppressors? Your committee tells you that "the Kellogg government is only sustained by the Federal military," and that "if Louisiana were a country by itself, McEnery and his associates would at once be installed into power." Yes, sir; and if it were an alien country and people, and such a revolution were to occur, unblinded as you would then be by partisan and sectional prejudice and hate, your party would be among the first to rejoice at the recovery by men of your own race of their rights and liberties and at the overthrow of a besotted carpet-bag government, which revels in plunder, and ever plots by every anti-republican scheme to consolidate its power.

One of the oldest members of your party, sir, who is on the verge of time, and is now a calm spectator of events, though none the less a republican—I mean the venerable Thurlow Weed—tells you what you all know but will not logically consider, that "in Louisiana there has been nothing but misrule, division, fraud, corruption, anarchy, and violence from the close of the war." Your party, sir, has possessed all the powers of government, military and civil, ever since the war; and such is the fearful record your friend makes up of your rule. If misrule, fraud, corruption, and anarchy have prevailed there, you alone are responsible; and where these frightful portents flourish you have a fat soil for deeds of violence to spring up. If in the midst of all these horrors you will recollect that a desperate faction has been making continual fraudulent efforts to fasten upon the miserable people of that State the wasting and degrading rule of a high negro caste with low carpet-bag leaders, no one can be surprised that riots have occurred and angry masses of men have been hurled against one another and thus many men have been killed.

It suits the purposes of the ultraists to call the men on the one side of these conflicts murderers and assassins, though history does not generally call by that name men engaged in armed collisions in behalf of what they believe their rights and liberties. Apart from these riots and armed collisions, it is surely not surprising that in the midst of the boiling passions of men thus excited life is not as secure as it is in a well-ordered State; especially when we recollect that although the party in power there has every State officer, executive, judicial, and ministerial, and every Federal officer, judicial or ministerial, backed by the State militia and the Army of the United States under the enforcement laws, if judicial process is resisted, still the law is not vindicated nor are offenders brought to justice. To say that you cannot, while thus doubly armed, enforce law and protect life, is a confession of impotence as disgraceful to you as it is libelous to American character. To say that the poor misguided negro, who is a mere cat's-paw of the carpet-bagger, is daily shot down and the murderer goes scot-free, because the ministers of the law are powerless to arrest and punish even when the Federal courts are open to the prosecution of the offender, is manifestly false, when we reflect that the whole pestiferous race of plotters against the peace and happiness of these people, the men who originate and execute every vile scheme—your Kelloggs, Durells, Caseys, Packards, your perjured returning boards, and all the rest—daily walk the streets and live unharmed. The most credulous man must know that, if the controlling section of the conservatives are murderers and assassins and crime goes scot-free, these hated architects of mischief and ruin would have short shrift and a speedy exit.

Indeed, sir, I am persuaded that if we had a true list of men killed n that State during the last nine years of misrule, anarchy, corruption, and fraud, and should deduct from it those slain in these riots and uprisings of the people, and negroes killed by negroes, and conservatives killed by all classes, the list of horrors that is so constantly paraded before the country to inflame the Northern mind to madness would be reduced to very limited proportions—little beyond what might be expected in a State governed by men more busily engaged in filling their purses than in executing the laws. And I am further persuaded that when such murders of negroes occur, if the courts were half as earnestly supported by republican authorities outside the State as democrats and conservatives are bespattered by them with abetting assassination, such crimes would (as they ought) be suppressed, by whomsoever committed. That it is not done, is rather an evidence that they do not wish to shut up a rich mine of political resources, which will multiply themselves, if they can be successfully used, in the grant of powers dangerous to liberty, destructive of States, and productive of fresh instances of crime and anarchy. Thus they will embark upon an endless cycle of disorder, usurpation, and military supremacy which appalls the mind and sickens the heart of the lover of his country and of liberty.

Mr. Speaker, I boldly aver that the only class in this country who rejoice in southern outrages is a section of the republican leaders. Democrats not only condemn all such crimes, but deeply deplore them; for they know nothing could occur more disastrous to them. The revolutionary section of your republican leaders—your men of the Mountain—condemn but hail them with joy, for they know it is only so much fuel for them to throw upon the slumbering fires of sectional hate. We know, if we could be base enough to capture a southern State by murder and assassination of the poor negro, we should deserve and should not fail to lose many northern States. The ultraists on the other side seem to think they can capture State after State by the arbitrary use of military power, and that they can divert the minds of the northern people from their revolutionary schemes, and at the same time inflame their hearts to the pitch of the old war fever by loud, persistent, and demoniac yellings about blood and murder. Some of them really think that the intelligence of the northern people is pretty much on a par with that of the wild beast in the Spanish bull-fight, before whose eyes it is only necessary to flaunt a blood-red rag to arouse him to a violent rage and a fierce onslaught. We have faith that that people will not fail to see the selfish motives these agitators have in thus striving to arouse their passions, and on a foundation of sectional hate and discord to build up their power.

A wise man, who was never a democrat—I mean Judge Story—has warned us that "if a despotic government is established in one State it will bring on the ruin of the whole Republic." Beyond question Louisiana's government, born of a judicial fraud and ever since maintained by force, aided in turn by fraud and perjury, is as perfect a despotism as ever disgusted mankind. It is a despotism whose real seat is Washington. It shows its readiness to use force on all occasions by regulating the affairs of a sheriff's office at Vicksburg. It is a despotism that spurns all show of consistency—any rule but arbitrary power—by thirsting to overthrow to-day the government which it established by a threat of force in Arkansas yesterday. This despotism proposes to pull down the whole fabric of a State government, which might not now be in existence but for its aid at the least meritorious stage of existence, with as little compunction as a child would use in overthrowing its house of cards. Despotism never cares how flimsy are its pretexts, when it purposes to do an act that strengthens its hold on power. One act only serves for a pretext for another, because the people submit to it; and thus, as Story says, the road is laid open "for a despotic government in one State to ruin the whole Republic." It may only propose now to murder Southern States; but if it is once permitted to leap beyond the limit prescribed by our laws and sacred traditions, it is bound by the very law of force to grind to powder all resistance to its will, or be itself overthrown in a deadly civil war, which will crimson every valley in our land with blood.

Why, then, sir, encourage our military President to overthrow State governments by force? Why disgrace our country and its institutions by arming him with more than monarchical powers? Why show ourselves unworthy of freedom by placing the great writ of right in the power of any man, especially a man of military training and instincts? The President is looking to an improper and dangerous continuation of power, which one of his friends—the leader of the Mountain—has described as not only a possible, but a desirable event; and they propose to give him the power of making force omnipotent whenever and wherever he chooses. I should take such men to be madmen, if I did not know that there never was a Cæsar who did not have his Antonies. And, Mr. Speaker, in their efforts to blacken the character and distort the actions of the southern people, and thence to deduce the necessity of granting imperial powers to the President, these gentlemen utterly forget to look at the condition of the Southern States at the present time and for months past. Where are there now or have there been for long months any disturbances or outrages even charged in the South? None scarcely in Louisiana, say your committee, since last September; none anywhere else, say men of commerce and men of religion and men of northern birth and republican faith. The democrats of the country, knowing that any acts of an oppressed people would be charged as encouraged and approved by them, have continually told them to be betrayed into no act of retaliation and violence, and that all acts of intemperateness on their part would only rivet their chains and prolong their slavery. The leaders of the democratic party, in and out of Congress, who are daily taunted with being apologists for murder, warning these people that their only hope of salvation depends on the justice of the northern people, have conjured them to be quiet and submissive, however grinding their oppression and galling their slavery. God grant that such advice may not long be necessary under a Government that calls itself free! But I ask, where such advice is given, and where people are and have been for a long time quiet, where is the necessity for armies to overthrow State governments and bills to create dictatorships, unless it be to make more "hells" in the South, and to manipulate votes for the Presidency?

Mr. Speaker, deplorable as is the condition of the southern people, it seems to excite no pity or sympathy in some of our northern people. Subjected to every buffet of war and every phase of misrule, it seems that nothing which the tongue of slander can distill against them is too vile. If they strive to throw off the rule of thieves and plunderers, they are unrepentant traitors and rebels. If they labor to escape from the groveling rule of ignorant Africans who are banded together with devilish skill against them, they are foes to the rights of man, striving to erect a rule of caste instead of fleeing from its hideous embrace, or they are painted as the vile old slaveocracy, whose aim it is to re-establish the monster of slavery. Nothing is too absurd or improbable to be charged against them. Why, sir, so foreign to the minds of the southern people is the resurrection of slavery in any form, so remote from our wishes, that when down with us a man is heard striving to pack the negroes with any such party cry, if we did not know him to be a knave, we should set him down for a fool. When such a charge is made here to frighten the North out of its propriety, we must ascribe such freaks of folly to the ignorance of a blind partisanship, or to the unscrupulousness of the party zealot, who will stop at nothing to arouse bad blood between the sections. Of the latter class, a famous leader the other day charged that the controlling minority of these people were murderers, assassins, and horse thieves. At another time, with a pruriency of taste and a deadliness of hate well befitting the man, he became a scavenger in the realms of the social evil, picking up here and there a choice bits of scandal to characterize and brand with infamy a whole people, in a speech which, as to its facts on this point, was a monstrous distortion, and as to its argument was a hideous mockery. And when a gallant southerner unhorsed him in a tilt of his own choosing, another gentleman from a more northern State, usually courteous and kind, leaps into the lists, and forgetting who provoked this war of abuse, and discounting time for charges against these persecuted people, and rehashing certain stale old political cant, heard again in his feverish imagination the crack of the slave-driver's whip, and saw the backs of republicans in the next Congress flayed black and blue. Sir, when such seems the animus of leading northern men, and so many are cultivating hate upon principle, torturing their minds to find food for strife and pretexts for oppression, well may the cry of væ victis, the old-time wail of conquered nations held in bondage, spring from the lips of southern men. But we will hope on, knowing hate to be short-lived and justice eternal.

Civil Rights.

SPEECH OF HON. W. T. HAMILTON,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 27, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights—

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: General debate on this bill closes at two o'clock, according to the understanding had day before yesterday. Other Senators desire also to speak before the debate closes. Therefore it is utterly impossible for me to go into this subject as I should desire, for the purpose of expressing my views upon the various questions that arise under the provisions of the bill. I am obliged to be as brief as possible in expressing my dissent in the strongest terms of which I am capable to the passage of a measure like this, fraught as I think it is with all kinds of evil to every section of the country. It is not a blow directed against one section only, but from the Passamaquoddy to the Rio Grande the principles that pervade this bill and the powers that are asserted upon the face of it extend down deep into the foundations of American liberty, and if permitted to become the law of the land, without protest or remonstrance, it will be used as a precedent in future times to subvert every vestige of local self-government that now belongs to the States, and which should be cherished as their most sacred heritage.

It is true, Mr. President, that this bill is stripped of some of the worst features that have marked bills of this character which have been before us since I have been a member of this honorable body. When this bill, or one similar in its objects, was first brought to the notice of the Senate by the late Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] we then felt and understood its assertion of power in the comprehensive language of its provisions that it was intended to pervade all the relations of civil society in the States. It passed from his paternal care to the foster care of the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] Massachusetts could stand a bill of that kind. At the last session of Congress I admonished my honorable friend from New Jersey that the liberal spirit of his people would not stand it. They did not. Now it appears in this body under the protecting care of the able Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] That State I presume can stand it.

Mr. President, it is to the bold and reckless assertion of power which is spread all over this bill that I particularly object. Bad as it is in its practical details, it is nothing when compared to its arrogant assumption of authority. I shall not dwell long upon the constitutionality of this bill. That branch of the subject was so ably enforced by the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] last evening, and by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] this morning, that there is not left a rack of it behind.

With but one allusion to show the anomalous position of honorable Senators on this floor, it may be proper for me to show the singular condition of this bill. I refer to the first and principal clause in it to show into what an extraordinary strait strong men are driven in the accomplishment of an object they have in view and which they are determined to accomplish regardless of the Constitution, of right, and of reason. The first clause of this section of the bill provides as it is worded in the last clause of the fourteenth amendment.

The first section reads as follows:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

The first section of the fourteenth amendment, and upon which rests all the powers claimed by this bill, is as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It will be observed the first clause of the bill is—

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The language of the last clause of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment is:

Nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The framer of this first section of the bill departed from the words of the Constitution with which he started out in the very first line for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon Congress by changing in a few lines thereafter the whole character of the language. He starts out with "persons" and ends with "citizens," and would seem to use them as convertible terms, and does not seem to recognize the distinction between persons and citizens.

Mr. President, can there be anything more eccentric in legislation than that? Every person is to have these enjoyments, these unobstructed enjoyments, under the penalties in the bill; and yet these enjoyments of persons are to be "subject to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color." Why not have it "applicable alike to persons of every race and color?" Why not end as you begin, with persons. You propose to legislate for persons within your jurisdiction. Why not continue to the end the purpose? Is there any difference between the rights of a person within the United States and a citizen as to the privilege of an inn, a theater, or public conveyance? There is none. There are great distinctions between them, but not in these respects. If the Constitution means to extend this protection to all persons, then you should not qualify it by any different rights applicable alone to citizens.

The whole shows how uncertain and indefinite the efforts of those are who undertake to put in the form of a bill or law some theory of redress under this provision of the Constitution when they have no fixed idea what that Constitution is, what it means, how it should be read, and what the intent and scope of such a provision must be; and when, in addition to the general muddle, they commingle "persons" with "citizens," and "citizens" of a State with "citizens" of the United States. There is one hotch-potch of the fourteenth amendment; indeed of all the late amendments, and of the whole Constitution in fact, attempted to be embraced in the first section of this bill, and consequently there can be no intelligent results.

To show how confused an effort of this kind must necessarily be when put in words, we need only refer to the arguments of honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber to sustain what they have thus fashioned into form. One, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] refers to the first clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment in defense of this measure; the other, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] refers to the last clause of that section. The first part of this section refers to "citizens;" the last part of it refers to "persons." The Senator from Indiana refers to that part of the fourteenth amendment which prevents a State from denying to "persons" the equal protection of the laws, and the Senator from Massachusetts refers to that part of the amendment which prevents a State from abridging the immunities or privileges of "citizens" of the United States.

That is the condition of the argument in favor of this bill. It is all confused, uncertain, unfixed as to what part of the Constitution it should relate and in what manner it should be vindicated.

Allow me to allude for one moment more to the position of gentlemen upon this floor to show into what straits they are still further driven in assigning reasons for the propositions which they undertake to defend. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] in his defense for such kind of legislation yesterday in his speech, said:

All that is claimed under the fourth section of this bill is that you shall not, in the State of Ohio or in Massachusetts or in Maryland, say that a man shall not sit upon a jury because he is a black man or because he is of the German race or because he has been held in slavery, and I might say for other reasons. If for other reasons discriminations were made by the law of any of these States, we might under the fourteenth amendment protect men from such discriminations.

Think of it! What other discriminations? The Senator says that if by any law of a State discriminations, whether on account of color or race or for any other reasons, are made—for with that Senator, as I understand him, one discrimination has as much force as another—then under the fourteenth amendment Congress may intervene and prevent them. We know there are a thousand discriminations made in the local laws of the different States—discrimination as to sex, discrimination as to age, discrimination as to nativity, as to education, as to crime, and even, in some of the States, as to religion; in fact, there are endless discriminations, and as various as the States differ in their respective notions of civil polity; and if you undertake to intervene for a discrimination in one respect that you may hold to be unjust or anti-republican, then upon the ground the Senator puts it, under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, nothing can escape the powers of Congress.

There is not a discrimination made in any State which it would not embrace; it would make an unbroken uniformity of law throughout the Union, and that uniformity to depend upon majorities in Congress. Indeed, you could not prevent a Massachusetts man from enoying all the rights and privileges of a citizen of my own State the moment he gets within the limits of Maryland, entitled at once to take part in all our local affairs, even to the exercise of that right—the highest of all rights—the right of an elector, although the constitution of Maryland does deny that right unless a resident within its limits for twelve months.

I see the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I presume he will hardly contend for the doctrine that one by reason of his being a citizen of the United States or of any State can in defiance of a constitutional prohibition of his State, in prescribing age or residence to qualify as an elector, still appear at the polls and vote, and upon the ground that being a citizen no discrimination could be made against him under the fourteenth amendment for any reason. My State requires a residence of twelve months before the exercise of any such right. A citizen of Massachusetts or of the United States could then come into my State, and by virtue of his right as such a citizen, and not by that as a citizen of Maryland, participate with us in our local government in all its relations, from the right of voting to the holding of office, and that from the moment he sets his foot within our borders; and upon the ground and for the reason that as citizens of our own State are entitled to do all this, the discrimination that would exclude the citizen from other States or of the United States for any period of time or for all time would be unjust and anti-republican, and would be a matter subject to the powers of Congress under the fourteenth amendment. So that in this respect, as in all respects where you would interfere under this amendment to make all things alike, you would consolidate uniformity in making the rights and immunities and privileges of the citizens of one State precisely like those of another, by abolishing all distinctions that local laws would establish in any of the relations of life or in the exercise of any of the rights that hitherto were supposed to be exclusively in the power of the States to establish.

All local self-government would be lost in the dreary uniformity of congressional action, when to its higher law they could make all States in their legislation conform to what a majority in Congress might or might not determine to be discriminations between persons or citizens.

Mr. President, it seems incomprehensible to me that any such doctrine should prevail at this day. Although you have limited this bill to theaters and inns and public conveyances and have not extended it to public schools, seminaries of learning, and academies; to churches, to cemeteries, to associations of all kinds; though you have not extended it to the selection of judges, to the selection of administrative officers, or to legislative assemblies, you do, both directly and indirectly, assert that right over all, and it pervades the whole face of this bill. Establish the principle involved in this bill, maintain this assertion of authority, and there is no function in which the State does not seem to possess the power to discriminate against a citizen of the United States, a citizen of any other State, or of any "person" that is not overwhelmed in destruction. It is gone, and the spirit of our whole civil government is gone; our local self-government is gone. It is transferred from sovereign and independent States in so many of their relations with each other, from the local control of our people, and it is planted here, and here it is to construct an empire to overshadow all, overpower all, even to be greater and stronger and more renowned in its power than imperial Rome in its palmiest days.

Therefore, Mr. President, while here, an American citizen devoted to the institutions of my country, brought up to reverence the great principles of its Constitution, believing in local self-government and the power and the ability of the people in their respective States and localities to attend to their own domestic affairs, and with a knowledge of their own local interests better fitted to direct them, I here now, as I have ever heretofore and shall ever hereafter, protest against this measure—protest against any recognition of the powers which it asserts the right to exercise.

The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] on the other hand, confessedly puts his whole case upon the last clause or clauses of the first section of the fourteenth amendment; and he admitted in his speech yesterday that the States had the right to impose a property qualification of any amount, in his own language, from $500 to $5,000, to qualify a man to sit upon a jury; to impose the qualification that he should be able to read and write; to impose the qualification that he should be a naturalized citizen; to impose the qualification that he should have had a residence of any stated time. He acknowledged all this to be within the province of State legislation to determine; and yet with that concession to the States to make these distinctions, strong and effective as they are and some of them most obnoxious and unjust, distinctions that would in fact at one fell swoop sweep out of existence three million nine hundred thousand of the people as jurors or as electors or as officers of any kind, whose special interests he upon this floor is always ready to defend, he stops short when he comes to color.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator is willing to concede all that, comprehensive as it is; but he sticks upon color! There he approaches forbidden ground. He is willing to concede that a poor man is within the protection of the law and yet not allowed to participate in the administration of public justice in the capacity of a juror. He concedes that a man who cannot read and write may not be allowed to participate in the administration of public justice, and yet he is within the protection of the law. He concedes that a person not naturalized can be prohibited from participating in the administration of public justice, and yet he is within the protection of the law—all, all within that protection meant by the fourteenth amendment. But as soon as you touch color, then at once my honorable friend from Indiana indignantly declaims that it is forbidden by this amendment. Color! It is by that the Senator stands. And yet that honorable Senator knows, and we all know, that the word "color" is not mentioned, save in the fifteenth amendment, in any part of the Constitution, and that is only where the State is denied the power to abridge the right to vote on account of "race or color." "Color" is not in the fourteenth amendment; "race" is not in the fourteenth amendment. No distinctions of that kind whatever are mentioned, and were never thought of, never dreamed of, and it was only because it was thought necessary for the self-protection of the colored race that their right to vote was not permitted to be abridged by the fifteenth amendment; but every other right, every other power of discrimination, if you so choose to call it, which had been exercised by the States in the administration of their governments and in which qualifications for office, qualifications for electors, qualifications for jury duty and for other public duties were prescribed and were distinctions of sex, of age, of nationality, of color, of education, of virtue, of crime, of religion—more or less obtain in the several States, just as the people happen to think at the time, remained unimpaired; and the States possess this right of self-government to-day.

I recognize very well, Mr. President, when an appeal is made, the difference between what may be just or expedient and what the power or right we possess. The honorable Senator from South Carolina and the honorable Senator from Georgia were disputing a few minutes ago whether colored people served on juries in Georgia or not. As a matter of justice or expediency that is to be left to the people of the States. That has nothing to do with the question of power either to limit or extend it. There are many powers conferred in a Constitution or left with the people to be exercised that equally involve justice and right and order no less than the one which so much concerns the friends of this bill. If the State so ably represented by my honorable friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] thinks it the better policy, the juster policy, to permit minors and ladies and non-residents and all classes, white and black, to sit upon juries, that is the right and duty of that State to determine—not mine and still less this Congress. If the State which I have the honor in part to represent does not permit non-residents and minors and females and colored persons to sit on juries, that is our own policy and which we are to determine for ourselves, and as a just and a fair people we will determine for the good of the State and of her people.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. My honorable friend will understand I took the floor at twelve o'clock; it is now past one o'clock, and I only have been speaking fifteen minutes; other gentlemen taking the time.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no disposition to interrupt; I merely thought that the Senator would allow me to ask a question right at that point.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There are other gentlemen to speak, and I cannot spare the time in answering questions, as the general debate closes at two o'clock.

Mr. President, with these brief and imperfect allusions to one or more of the constitutional aspects of the question, the whole subject of which has been so ably and unanswerably discussed, I now leave this view of it.

But I object to this bill, because by the second section it undertakes to make that a crime which is not now a crime by law. It is no crime by law now, subject to no penalty, for the manager of a theater not to permit certain persons to enter it. It would make it a crime which never has been nor ever ought to be a crime. It provides that where a person is excluded from a theater by reason of color or race the manager is liable to a penalty of $500, to be paid to the party aggrieved, and in addition shall, if found guilty, be fined "not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year."

Have we not crimes and penalties enough; or if not, should they not be directed to greater objects than the right to visit theaters or other places of amusement?

I consider this as not only a most dangerous invasion of private rights, but as unworthy of the grave duties which so much demand the attention of Congress.

Again, I am opposed to this bill because it undertakes to give statutory damages for private injuries. By the second section of the bill it is provided that any one aggrieved may sue the party offending—

the manager or proprietor of the theater, the innkeeper, the common carrier—for the alleged wrong and the damages to be recovered shall be $500. Think of it, Mr. President! The idea that the Congress of the United States should be to-day engaged in determining the private relations of our people; that the Congress of the United States to-day should undertake to fix $500 as the sum to be paid for a refusal to admit a person of color to a theater, to an inn, to a public conveyance! It is a scene fit for the occasion—an expiring Congress dealing a last blow to civil liberty! All private wrongs under the common law are to be compensated according to the injury done. Is it not right and just and humane that it should be so? Therefore, if under the common law any one is wrongfully excluded from a theater or from an inn or from a public conveyance, the measure of damages is left to the jury, and proper, adequate, and legitimate compensation for the injury is to be awarded; but not so in this bill. If a person of color be turned from a theater or refused admission to an inn, $500 is absolutely fixed in this bill as the damages. We change the whole current of our law, its whole character, its humanity, its right, its native sense of justice which always addresses itself with so much power to an American mind, for it is accustomed to the great principles of the common law which have led us through centuries of trial to what from our experience, learning, and advantages should be our happiest days. But here they are all to be changed; you are to have no mitigating circumstances, you are to have no extenuation, you are to have no regard to the condition of the party charged with offending; you have no sympathy for him, poor and penniless. Whatever a jury might find against him, however trivial, will not satisfy your demand. No; $500 it must be; nothing else will do. It is "the pound of flesh," Mr. President. Is there reason, is there humanity, is there right in such a bill as this in a Government where we pretend to cherish the principles of republicanism? In the common administration of law our private injuries are determined, as we may more or less be a sufferer. Judges and juries and courts are established to that end; but here the party aggrieved, as I said before, however trivial the injury may be, is entitled to his "pound of flesh" and we are to register the edict to-day.

I am opposed to any such provision. As an American citizen—as an American Senator who would guard the trial by jury in its great and generous meaning, and who would hold it as sacred as the honor of the country itself; who looks upon it as the paladium of our liberty and the bulwark of our security in life and property—I protest against the cruel principles of this bill as incorporated in this provision.

Mr. President, now I come to the jury clause of the bill. Theaters, inns, and public conveyances are mere matters of personal interest and private concern. I may go to a theater if I choose, I can stay away if I choose, or I may not be permitted to go and yet suffer no injury. I would here dwell for a moment and ask my honorable friends around me whether at this late period of the session it is altogether proper that we should be leaving the great questions of government—leaving our appropriation bills, with a Government clamoring for revenue, with tax bills before us, with a currency which is a dishonor to the country, with a Government without money it is alleged to carry it on and maintain the public credit; all your industries suffering, prostrate in the dust; when we hear the murmurings of a whole people coming up to this body, that we should be here to-day legislating upon the question as to whether a person of any color or of any race who from any cause was not allowed to enter a theater should be entitled to the privilege of recovering $500 for his own personal benefit, and besides that the person offending should be compelled to answer as a criminal and be fined at least $500 in addition? Consider! There is nothing about churches, nothing about schools, nothing about associations of serious concern, nothing about legislative bodies, nothing about courts; but "theaters, and other places of public amusement" only have marked respect in this bill.

My honorable friend from Indiana would agree with me, for he comes from a State where there is some emotion of liberty left, that were any one to get up a theater or an amusement of any kind he would, I think, be allowed to select his audience just as he chose and as he could. If he made no money by reason of his selections, that would be his own misfortune and no one's wrong. I would leave his own personal interests guide him. If he should even in this city—the capital as it is—put up a theater and undertake, as his own property, to admit one and exclude another for any cause, whether on account of race or color or condition, or whatever it might be, that would be his own business and not mine, either as a citizen or as a legislator. He could do so just as well as the butcher at his stall, just as the grocer at his store, just as the officer at the counter of his bank, and refuse admission or favor or accommodation to any one; but if you can enter into all the relations of life embraced in this bill, there is none to escape its grasp whenever the occasion may move you.

But, Mr. President, this jury clause comes nearer home. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the causes aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

This question goes down deep into the very foundations of civil polity in the States in the administration of public justice and in the absolute right that we should enjoy in the administration of our local laws in the control and direction of our own domestic affairs. This jury clause I care nothing for in itself. It is a wreck as it stands in this bill. It has no force; it has no form; it is without form in line and in word and void of all force and effect, and can never be carried into execution. It never can be brought to the real adjudication of any official tribunal. While this may all be so in fact, it is against the dangerous assertion of authority that I protest. The idea that we sitting here to-day should solemnly undertake to direct how Maryland and Vermont shall proceed in the selection of a jury to try causes of their own people in their own domestic relations!

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I suggest to the Senator that I think he misunderstands the section. This bill does not propose to direct anybody; but like a bill of rights it proposes to say that no State shall invade the rights of a citizen. This is all—quite a different thing.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Like a declaration of rights! No State shall invade the rights of a citizen! I understand the Senator from Vermont. By the language of the Senator, that "no State shall invade the rights of a citizen," we would be deprived of the right to discriminate between citizens of a State or "persons," as the Senator from Indiana would have it, and therefore it is direct intervention. This section forbids, under severe penalties, a thing to be done which we have always done, and claim a right still to do, and which we ought to have the right to do; and my honorable friend from Vermont says that that is no intervention. What is it? A conceded right that we always enjoyed, a right that we now possess and will continue to enjoy in the future, is forbidden by this bill to be exercised? and the Senator says that is not intervention. He and I may differ about the true meaning of the word.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to the last clause of the fourth section:

And any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the causes aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I was coming to that. You forbid a certain thing to be done, and you direct a certain other thing to be done. It says that you shall not exclude or disqualify, nor shall you fail to summon for any of the causes mentioned, under a given penalty; and to whom is this directed? Not to United States officers only; you can direct them as you please; but it is also directed to the officers or the people of the State. Certain persons or citizens are declared not to be disqualified as jurors. If the person having the selection of jurors fail to summon for any of the interdicted causes, he is liable to a penalty, even to the extent of $5,000.

Mr. President, I ask in all reason, in all candor, whether this is not interfering not only with our domestic affairs generally, but is it not directly interfering with the discretion of the appointing or selecting power existing by authority of the State alone and alone subject to the laws and constitution of the State? Is not this an intervention with the discretion of the appointing power of the State? You can with the same propriety, and with infinitely more propriety, interfere with the discretion of the appointing power of the President as to all the offices in the country. You can with the same degree of propriety interfere with your appointing power in this Chamber, circumscribed as it is, or with the appointing power of your judicial officers, or with the appointing power of the governors of the States; nay, you may go down to the people, because wherever this discretion rests, whether it be with the people at the polls, or whether it be with the President or the governor of a State or the members of Congress, it is the discretion you attack in the selection of persons for a public or private duty or trust.

To show the utter, absolute folly of all this, suppose these jurors were elected by the people. They might be elected by the people, and in some States they are so elected. Suppose in Maryland to-day we were to refer the selection of jurors to the people; how would my honorable friend direct the force of this bill against such a body in the selection of jurors? I think in the State of Maine, and it may be in the State of New Hampshire, jurors are elected by the people, and so over the whole land it might be. When you strike at the discretion of an appointing power you touch its freedom and independence. You can with the same degree of propriety insist that when the people themselves vote they shall not vote against a person because of his race or color where such discriminations are prohibited. The logic of the one is the logic of the other. And yet my honorable friend from Illinois will admit that any voter in any district in his State could declare upon the hustings and at the polls that he did oppose a person because of his race and color for a juror or for any other position and be liable to no law; and would Congress in all its asserted plenitude of power impose penalties for so doing?

I ask gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber whether Congress could thus undertake by general legislation to confine and trammel and impress the discretion of the voter; and if it cannot do that, can it impress the discretion of a judge, impress the discretion of a sheriff who is authorized by the laws of the State under an oath of office to select suitable and proper persons as jurors according to the direction of the statute? In my own State the judges have the selection of jurors. They select a given number in each county, the number differing in different counties, and from that selection names are drawn to constitute the grand and petit juries for the term. Shall we thus undertake to trammel in any respect the discretion of the judge any more than you would impress the discretion of the voter? You have not the power; I defy the assembled wisdom of Congress. You cannot frame a law to-day, you have not words precise enough in the English language, you have not continuity of thought enough to frame a law that will do either. There is no judicial tribunal upon earth that will punish any one for exercising this discretion. There is no tribunal in this land I hope that could be brought to punish a voter for declaring his views and sentiments and why he did or did not vote for a person for any position. Therefore, while I am here protesting against the incorporation of such a section in this bill, against the assertion of authority to interfere in our local affairs, it is all practically nothing; it is a void and meaningless act if done, and can never be executed. It could hardly be executed even under a government like that of Tiberius.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to one thing more before I close the remarks that I have the honor of submitting upon this bill. There is one other objection that I have to this bill. It is another thorn thrust into our flesh; it is another antagonism between races; it is another effort here to array race against race, and still further retard the time when with mutual interest and mutual understanding we may measurably get along in harmony and with advantage to all and to the country. With all the antagonisms that appear natural almost to the races and that have come down to us since the morning of the first day and that exist at this day, and that will exist forever, we still can go along side by side guided by prudence and humanity, without injury to either. All who know me know that I have not a prejudice upon earth against the colored race. I can award to them all the virtues they possess. I can appreciate the fidelity with which they stood by their old masters in the late war when the latter were in the field far from their homes. I can attest to their general docility at my own home amidst the disorder, tumult, and strife of the times, and in fact by their quiet and peaceful deportment putting to shame white men who should have, from their opportunities and associations, known better.

My strong desire is that there shall be peace among us. I recognize that there is an antagonism between the races, and all men of all races of good sense acknowledge it. The English tongue! The admixture of Anglo-Saxon-Celtic blood makes a current broad enough and strong enough and deep enough to carry its civilization with the course of the sun, and, as does the reveille of the English drum, keep pace with its march around the earth; so also does the English tongue. The Greek tongue found its home all around the shores of the Mediterranean; and its civilization was extended to the far-off Indus, but how lost to the present are all its past glories. The Latin tongue carried the civilization of Rome to the ends of its boundless empire, and yet to-day it is only known to the learned in its ancient purity and vigor.

But to the English tongue is preserved a higher and a nobler destiny. It is to carry on its broad and vigorous bosom the hopes and liberties of nations not yet born. We know it! We see it! Its civilization is to cover whole continents, and its power is to be felt in all besides. Behold the island continent, Australia! Look at the Indies! The islands of the sea! Behold this whole continent—nay, the whole hemisphere—all, all is to be in the end the vast field of its undying power, and, it is to be hoped, of its boundless good.

A century hence there will be one hundred and fifty millions of English-speaking people on this continent and of the Anglo-Saxon-Celtic race—the white race of commingled blood, English, Celtic, and Germanic. The question of race is then settled; it is extinguished. The Indian will have disappeared. The African will be no stronger, if as strong; but in the aggregate a mere atom in the world of being. Time and population will settle for the aggressive race what you vainly attempt to settle by legislation. You will have equality among races. Time and population will have but one race on this continent. Nature will settle a question that you cannot by law. Interest and justice and humanity will accommodate the races here when your legislation does nothing but provoke and mislead. It inflames the white and misleads the colored.

I pray our friends on the other side of the Chamber to consider that we know something of our own interests; that we cherish our own convictions, understand our own feelings, and will not fail in either humanity or justice. I want our friends on the other side of this Chamber to remember that the landed property of twelve States is substantially owned in fact by members of the party in opposition to our friends on the other side of the Chamber. The property substantially of twelve States, with all its values, its enormous values, and all its productive powers and its enormous interests. Have we no cause, have we no reason, have we no interest in peace, in quiet, in giving to this immense territory, rich in all the productions of material wealth and inhabited by a people inferior to none on earth, its proper and normal position in this country, that the fruits of all this may be realized by them and their children? Can it be that we are not competent to understand our own interests or would fail from mere fatuity in pursuing them? Accord to us some degree of common sense and some disposition to use it. When you consider that great question, the elevation of that people, the true interests of that people, comprehend their necessities, realize their yearnings, and commensurately appreciate their aspirations to bring into available and productive power the immense resources of the vast territory of these twelve States, an empire in itself, accredit to them some degree of intelligence and some natural desire to be prosperous, contented, and happy.

I know the antagonisms between these two races. I know their relations now and I appreciate them. As we know and appreciate them better than you can, leave us together to work out the problem, if it be one, in all its consequences, and be assured that you in time will have no reason to complain. All our interests are mutual or dependent, and a wrong or an injury done to any is felt by all.

What is most needed now is that the material interests of the South be developed and you cannot help but be prosperous. There will soon be no trouble if you will but let those people attend to their own affairs and direct their own resources.

Living south of Mason and Dixon's line and because of our domestic institutions, now abolished and abolished forever, the sympathy of a large mass of our people was naturally with the South, although never abating their devotion to the Union.

All alike however are condemned before the world because education was not given to the slaves, and we are held responsible before the American people in the defense that our friends on the other side of the Chamber would make for putting the control of whole sections of the country into the hands of this ignorant multitude. And yet how easy the solution and how natural the change! In the days of slave labor it was marshaled by intelligence and directed by interest, just as much marshaled and just as much a mere part of machinery as the rank and file of an army. But things have changed with their changed relations. The slave had no cares then. The master had to provide all, direct all; it was his intelligence that put them to work; it was his intelligence that directed their efforts; it was his intelligence that made their labor profitable; but it is different now. They are now thrown on their own resources. Intelligence is a necessity to them and to the people among whom they live. The people of the South understand the change of condition, and now that the negro is free and is the master of his own personal conduct, no class of men are more impressed with the fact that there is a necessity for him to be intelligent and informed than the people South.

The diffusion of intelligence among the colored population is now to be one of the cardinal efforts of the southern people. When they were slaves they were mere machines; but now, as they are freemen, they are to be directed by their own will and by their own knowledge, whatever that may be; and, therefore, to make them valuable as a population, it is the interest of all to see to their advancement in knowledge. Maryland, Missouri, Tennessee, all the States of the South in fact, as far as their means will justify, are taking measures toward that end. We do not want helpless ignorance among us any more than you do. As I said before, when they were slaves we did not feel the friction, because intelligence directed them; but now that they are free, and ignorant and inexperienced in their new state, we feel the abrasion—and are impressed with the importance of it. What did the people of Maryland do at the last session of her Legislature? I refer to it to show how we are impressed and what we think is required to be done.

At the session of the Legislature begun in July, 1874, chapter 332, $460,000 was appropriated to the support of white schools and $100,000 to the support of colored schools for the year ending December 31, 1874. Also by act of the same session, chapter 511, there was appropriated the sum of $525,000 to the support of white schools and $100,000 to the support of colored schools for the year ending December 31, 1875. I refer to this to show that we manifest our willingness to tax ourselves, and without your intervention, in order to secure the benefits of a common education to these people. We know better than you can what our interests are and what we ought to do to subserve them.

Here is the population of the State: six hundred and five thousand white and one hundred and seventy-two thousand colored; so that all will admit a degree of fairness in the apportionment of the tax. This was appropriated because the necessity was felt in the changed relations of things; that these people among us should be intelligent not only for our own interest, but for their own moral and material well-being. Their degradation, their ignorance, their vices, uncontrolled by intelligent direction must be removed or abated; there must be a change in order to secure peace and good government among ourselves, and we are doing our duty toward them, and now I would ask our republican friends to let us go on in our own way in doing good as we shall be influenced by the circumstances of our condition.

Local self-government is everything—it means that we shall attend to our own local concerns, as we best understand them. We have lived among these people and we have got to die among them. I beg that you will allow us to travel along down the paths of time as our mutual interests and mutual good-will shall direct for all years to come, and you will not be troubled, this Government will not be harassed, whole sessions of Congress will not be taken up in legislation to force upon us the crudest ideas and by a people who do not know what they do, as this bill demonstrates. Nothing you can do will force out of order the natural condition of things. Your reconstruction policies have all failed. Your laws in the past have all failed where you would revolutionize nature itself; when you would legislate against local self-government among a people whose very being is identified with and is a part of it. All your attempts will fail as they have in the past failed in the results you fondly expected. They are a dead letter to-day upon your statute-books, and while you have caused much suffering, they are but the monuments of your folly. The prosperity of the people of the South, their unity, their slowly recovering resources, have all been made, all been built up in spite of your efforts to govern and oppress them. Give to that great people their liberty; give to them their own well-earned right to attend to their own internal concerns, and they will give you the best government on earth and a land favored with peace and filled with plenty.

Again I beseech you to stay your hand in the destructive measures that you would pass, alike fatal to that people and in the end as fatal to yourselves. You peril the liberty cherished by the hopes of mankind to gratify a sentiment that would well become a despot who beholds in uniformity the ideal of government.

Civil Rights—"The world is governed too much."

SPEECH OF HON. EPPA HUNTON,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1875.

On the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said on the civil-rights bill that but little can be uttered now either new or interesting. And yet I do not feel at liberty to suffer a vote to be taken without at least a protest against it. This bill is designed as one of the series of laws passed by the dominant party to reconstruct the Southern States after the war. It will be instructive to trace this legislation and to ascertain whether it has not been an absolute failure, and if so, whether Congress should not hesitate before passing this the most damaging and insulting of the series. When the war ended what was the condition of the people of the ten Southern States which attempted to withdraw from the Union? They were stripped of all their personal psoperty; they had nothing left but their lands and their debts; in many instances these lands had been devastated by the contending armies.

Scarcely can be found on record an instance where a people so honestly "accepted the situation" after a great war, and so earnestly went to work to repair their broken fortunes and provide for the necessities of their families.

In illustrating the effects of the policy of reconstruction I shall mainly speak of Virginia, my own State, the one least affected by this policy.

When the war ended the people of Virginia found that our grand old State had been dismembered and one-third of her territory torn from her by revolutionary means; her own State government driven out at the point of the bayonet, and what was known as the Pierpoint government took possession of the State. This government in both branches of its Legislature consisted, I believe, of thirteen persons elected by a few citizens in a few of the counties along the border of the State under the control of the Federal Army. The Virginians submitted quietly, peacefully to this government, obeyed its laws, held elections under it, and sent a full Legislature to Richmond at the close of the year 1865. But this government was too mild in the opinion of the party controlling the Federal Government for a subjugated people; the laws were enforced too tamely. Pierpoint was removed and H. H. Wells, a stranger to the State, was appointed in his stead without even the pretense of law.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted. This was ratified by Virginia as one of the sovereign States, and abolished slavery in the State. It was not enough to deprive us of property in our slaves which we all accepted as the legitimate result of the war, but we had by the adoption of this amendment to present the appearance of indorsing and agreeing to the wrong. We hoped this would suffice and that we would be left in peace to rehabilitate our State government and repair our wasted fortunes. But no; republican vengeance was not near sated. On the 16th day of June, 1866, the Congress of the United States adopted a joint resolution proposing another—the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution—the sole object of which was the oppression and prostration of the Southern States and to take the State governments from the hands of their own people and place them in the hands of carpet-baggers and the lately emancipated slaves, too recently emancipated to be capable of exercising the functions of electors or law-makers.

The third and most objectionable section of this amendment is in these words:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judical officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

By it many, nay, most, of our best and most experienced people were proscribed, and the offices thrown into the hands of inexperienced young men, who had engaged in the "rebellion" to the same extent as the others but were too young to hold offices requiring the oath before the war.

This resolution was never submitted to President Johnson for his approval or veto, but was transmitted directly to the States. It required for the ratification of it twenty-eight States before it became a part of the Constitution. Twenty-two ratified, two did not act, and thirteen, consisting of Kentucky, Delaware, Maryland, and the ten States lately the Confederate States, refused to ratify it. It was then maintained, I believe for the first time, that these ten States were not States in the Union, and the ratification by the twenty-two States was complete, and they were not to be counted in obtaining the three-fourths for ratification. Those who had therefore contended that the war was waged to preserve the Union, and to prevent these States from leaving the Union, suddenly shifted their ground and maintained that they were no longer States of the Federal Union. But well-founded apprehensions existed that this doctrine would be held erroneous when passions subsided and that this article would be decided to have no place in the Constitution. Besides this, the people in these Southern States were getting along too well and too peacefully; there were no disorders, no bloodshed; all had comparatively good State governments. The angry passions engendered by the war were rapidly passing away. Slavery, the one idea on which the republican party had been founded, had been abolished and settled forever. There was great danger that the republican party, having accomplished its mission, would die, and its party leaders sought a pretext for continuing the excitement and keeping up the bitterness between the sections. They inaugurated the reconstruction measures, a Pandora's box of evils to the South chiefly but carrying in their train widespread evil and injury to the whole country. The first of the series was approved March 2, 1867, and by the first section of it the ten Southern States were swept out of existence and divided into five military districts.

The second section assigns an officer of the Army not below the rank of brigadier-general to command each of these districts.

The third section imposed on these commanding generals the duty "to protect all persons in their rights of persons and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the peace and criminals." It also authorized them to organize military commissions or tribunals for the trial of offenders.

The fourth section limited the execution of the sentence of the military tribunal where it affected property or liberty till it was approved by the commanding general, and of the sentence of death till it was approved by the President.

The fifth section provides for the admission of these military districts into the Union as States:

When they had adopted a constitution framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of such States twenty-one years old, of all races, color, or previous condition who had resided in the State one year and who had not been disfranchised by participation in the rebellion or by felony at common law; and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualification of electors of delegates herein stated; and when such constitution shall have been ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the ratification who are qualified as electors for delegates; and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval and Congress shall have approved the same; and when said States by a vote of its Legislature elected under said constitution shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as the fourteenth amendment; and when said article shall have become a part of the Constitution, said State shall be entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law; and thereafter the preceding sections of this act shall be inoperative in said State: Provided, That no person excluded from holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be eligible to election to the convention or allowed to vote for members of such convention.

This act was passed over the veto of President Johnson, and when on its passage was characterized by a member of this House [Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, of New York] as the "most damnable act of this most damnable Congress." A resolution of censure was adopted. Parliamentary usage may have been violated, but history will vindicate the truth of his denunciation of this bill. By it ten States, sovereign States, some of them embraced in the original thirteen which achieved independence, were annihilated and converted into military districts, in which property and personal liberty had no other protection than was found in a military commission; where life itself could be taken by such tribunal if its sentence was approved by the President of the United States. It would be supposed that party hate and sectional malignity would be satisfied by the provisions of this bill, and that when these "military districts" were allowed to emerge from this state of vassalage and again be admitted into the privileges of the Union they would have been permitted to come back as sovereign States. But not so. When military vassalage became insupportable, and these States were forced at any cost to get rid of it, they found their way back into the Union hedged in and surrounded by the provisos, conditions, and limitations of the fifth section. They were compelled to elect delegates to the conventions to frame constitutions in a mode prescribed by the act of Congress; compelled to allow persons to vote who theretofore had not exercised the elective franchise; compelled to exclude both from voting and membership many of their most trusted, experienced, and peaceable citizens; compelled to submit their constitutions to the examination and approval of Congress; compelled to adopt the fourteenth amendment, which had been rejected by them; compelled to act against their will as a sovereign State in ratifying this amendment before they could be allowed any other privileges of a State; compelled in most cases by the peculiar provisions to surrender themselves for long years to the rule of carpet-baggers and the ignorant colored population. Other laws were enacted declaratory of this vile law, which made its provisions more odious and oppressive. Time would fail if I attempted to trace and comment on all.

The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted, which declares—

That the right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The fourteenth amendment forces the States to accept the colored people as citizens, and the fifteenth compelled them to clothe these same colored people with the elective franchise and eligibility to office, while they deprived thousands of the best white citizens of these inestimable privileges.

By these provisions nearly all the Southern States in accepting the terms and conditions of these laws and constitutional amendments, in ridding themselves of their state of military vassalage, passed under the misrule of carpet-baggers and negroes. Some are still under this misrule, while most of them have after years of trial secured the governments to the real bona fide people of the States, and are now enjoying tolerably good governments, administered by themselves, under which all persons of whatever color are protected in the enjoyment of all their rights.

The fate of down-trodden South Carolina seems almost hopeless. Still under the State government forced upon her she remains, and will it is feared long remain, a monument to the hate of sectional malignity. Louisiana would be free but for the unauthorized and tyrannical interference of the Federal Executive. This policy of reconstruction was not the emanation of statesmanship, was not designed to restore these States to equal privileges in the Union, was not pursued to bring back material prosperity to these States; but was conceived in hatred and intended to raise up a race of voters subservient to the dictates of the radical party and designed to be the means of controlling the politics of these States. What has been the effect of this policy upon the material interests of these States? The people, borne to the very dust by the ravages of the war, stripped of their labor, with nothing but their naked lands to pay their debts and make a living for themselves and their families, have been systematically robbed and plundered by these governments forced upon them by the reconstruction policy, and which were run by persons having little or no interest in them, until many of them became bankrupt, and the people, unable to pay the taxes necessary to pay the debts contracted by these governments, are being sold out by the tax-gatherer, and their lands returned delinquent will soon be sold for the taxes due on them. The whole southern country is to-day languishing in almost hopeless bankruptcy, caused mainly by the effects of this policy of reconstruction.

The debts of these Southern States have been increased more than $200,000,000, as follows:

Alabama:
Debts July 1, 1861	$5,939,654 87
Debts July 1, 1871	38,381,967 37
Arkansas:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	4,036,952 87
Debts and liabilities in 1871	19,761,265 62
Florida:
Debts and liabilities in 1868	528,856 95
Debts and liabilities in 1871	15,763,447 54
Georgia:
Debts and liabilities in 1860, about	3,000,000 00
Debts and liabilities in 1871	44,137,500 00
Louisiana:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	10,099,074 34
Debts and liabilities in 1871	41,194,473 91
North Carolina:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	9,699,500 00
Debts and liabilities in 1871	34,887,467 85
South Carolina:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	4,000,000 00
Debts and liabilities in 1871	29,158,914 47
Mississippi:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	None.
Debts and liabilities in 1870	$1,796,971 30
Tennessee:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	20,105,606 66
Debts and liabilities in 1871	45,688,263 48
Texas:
No debt before the war.
Debts and liabilities in 1871, including railroad bonds	17,000,000 00
Virginia:
Debts and liabilities in 1861	31,938,144 59
Debts and liabilities in 1871	47,390,839 96

These debts have in many instances been diminished since the States have escaped from the clutches of the vultures who had seized the bodies-politic and preyed upon their very vitals. But what cared they for the prosperity of these States, so long as they accumulated fortunes and enjoyed their own salaries? The tax-payers on whom the State depended often had no voice in the government of the State; they were carefully excluded by the terms of reconstruction. Those who imposed the taxes paid but little, in many instances none. Take South Carolina as an example, probably as extreme as any. In 1871 the executive officers paid taxes as follows:

Governor R. K. Scott	None.
Lieutenant-Governor L. Boozer	$15 90
Adjutant and Inspector-General F. J. Moses, jr	1 00
Secretary of State F. L. Cardozo	None.
Comptroller-General J. L. Neagle	None.
Treasurer N. J. Parker	None.
Attorney-General D. H. Chamberlain	None.
Superintendent of Education J. K. Jillson	None.

Instances without number might be given where the people have been swindled by their corrupt rulers forced upon them by the action of Congress. The effect of this State rule need hardly be told. Poverty stares the people in the face; their very heart has been crushed out; their property, the little left after the war, has been sacrificed. Thousands upon thousands have been forced into bankruptcy. The effect of all this is not confined to the debtor class. The creditor loses the debts due him, and he sinks from affluence or independence to poverty. Ruin is now staring thousands in the face who up to this time have weathered the storm. Agriculture, manufactures, and all other industries are languishing. There seems to be no relief for the present, no hope for the future.

Are the bad effects of these laws confined to the Southern States? No country as a whole can thrive when a large portion of it is so crippled. When the condition of the business of the Northern and Western States, stimulated into unnatural prosperity by the war, has come down to the natural conditions of a nation at peace, we find commerce, trade, agriculture, mining, and all other industries languishing, partly, if not mainly, on account of the condition of these Southern States, which afford the market for the North. What means the cry for bread from the thousands of unemployed poor at the North? Men anxious to work, but who can find none. Look in any direction you choose, poverty and distress stare you in the face. Is any one so blind that he cannot see that this state of affairs owes its existence in a great degree to the destitution of these Southern States caused by Federal oppression and outrage?

The eyes of the people of this country are being opened to the true condition of affairs. They already begin to see the disastrous effects of republican legislation on the whole country, and that the republican party, which owed its existence and success to the prejudice against slavery, was attempting to perpetuate its power or prolong its existence by keeping alive the hatred between the sections and entailing ruin on the whole country. The elections last fall afforded some indication of the awakening of the people to the true condition of affairs. This branch of the present Congress shows a majority of about one hundred for the republican party. The Congress which succeeds this on the 4th of next March will show in this branch about seventy majority against this party. This political revolution, unexampled in the history of parties, is full of meaning. It means that the days of this party, the authors of so much misery and woe to the South, so much financial distress to the whole country, are numbered.

I beg the republican party to pause—to cease this relentless war on the people of the South. Do the leaders of this party wish further to depress the white men of the South and elevate the colored men to social equality? Why press this civil-rights bill, which will be so injurious to both races? I fear the machinery of party and the party will be or have been successfully used to effect this object. The rules of this House which have governed it for more than fifty years have been changed for the purpose of forcing this and other bills through this House to the prejudice of the South.

But whence is the power derived to pass this bill? We have been taught to believe that this Government was one of limited powers, deriving all its powers from the Constitution of the United States, and that this Federal Government had no power over any subject unless granted by the Constitution. We know that the power to pass such laws as this was never claimed till the fourteenth amendment became a part of the Constitution. Let us see briefly if any such power was given or intended to be given by that amendment. It is claimed that the first and fifth sections of this amendment give this power. Unless found in these two sections, the passage of this law will be a plain usurpation of power reserved to the States:

SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The first clause of the first section makes all persons (white and colored, native and naturalized) citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. This provides for two classes of citizenship, of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. The second clause provides that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The prohibition upon the States is against the passage or enforcement of a law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, but not the privileges and immunities of the citizen of a State. Now, it is clear from the words of this section the privileges and immunities of the United States may be of one class and those of a State of another and quite a different class; and if this be true, then this amendment gives no power to Congress over these privileges of citizens of the State. What are the privileges of citizens of a State? Judge Washington, in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, in 3 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, 371, thus defines them:

We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental, which belong of right to citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose the Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may be comprehended, however, under the following general heads: Protection by the Government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole.

These are the privileges and immunities of citizens of States, and they cover every one of the provisions of this bill. The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are to be found only in the Constitution of the United States, and no such privileges as are sought to be given in this bill can be found in the Constitution. An illustration of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States may be found in the fourth article of the first amendment, which says:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, &c.

The power given in this amendment to legislate being confined to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, Congress has no right to invade the exclusive domain of State legislation and meddle with these fundamental privileges of the citizens of the States. This view is fully sustained by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace's Reports, and of the supreme court of Ohio in the case of The State vs. The City of Cincinnati, 19 Ohio, 178.

But if, by the ingenuity of construction, the language of this amendment could be made to embrace these fundamental privileges which belong alone to the citizen of the States, still the constitutional difficulty would remain. The language of the amendment is that no State shall make or enforce any such law, not that Congress may make such a law. It is a prohibition upon a State, not a power conferred on Congress. It is a power given to the courts of the Federal Government to declare unconstitutional and void any such law as may be passed by the States. It is a power given to the Federal Government only to pass upon the validity of State laws on this subject, and cannot be a power given to Congress to act by legislation directly on the persons of the States by enforcing penalties for violating its provisions.

The Constitution declares that no State shall pass a law impairing the obligations of contracts. It cannot be and never has been contended that this provision enabled Congress to meddle by legislation with the private contracts of citizens of the several States, but only gave to the Federal courts the power to declare all such laws unconstitutional and void which impair the obligations of contracts. This illustration is familiar to every lawyer. But it is maintained that the fifth section, which gives to Congress the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the fourteenth article, gives the power to Congress to pass this bill. The power contained in this fifth section was already granted by the last clause of the eighth section of the first article of the original Constitution, which says:

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

As well contend that this last clause authorized the Congress to enter the wide field of legislation regulating contracts between citizens of the States as that the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment conferred on the Congress the right to pass this bill. The meaning of both is that Congress shall so provide that the Federal judiciary shall have the power and means to declare any such laws unconstitutional and void. This has already been done by the judiciary act and amendments thereto.

But this bill should not pass if the power of Congress to pass it was conceded and plain It professes to be for the benefit of the colored man. It is believed it will be ruinous alike to the white and colored race.

I desire to say here that the white people of the South generally have no such prejudices against the blacks as are ascribed to them by the people of the Northern States. They are willing and desirous to give them protection in every right and to concede to them equality before the law; but they will resist by all legal means every attempt, whether in or out of Congress, to establish social equality between the races. There still remains much of the feeling of kindness toward the colored people which existed in the days of slavery. During the war, when the white male population was in the army, their wives and daughters were often left at home under the protection of the slaves. Many of them deserted their posts when the Federal Army approached, but I know of no instance in which this trust was betrayed by violence. When the war ended and the freedom of the slaves was an accepted fact in the Southern States, they were orderly and polite. Kindness existed between the men who but recently occupied the relation of master and slave, which relation had just been rudely sundered by the fate of war.

Not until the meanest of the northern people came among us and sowed the seeds of discontent and impertinence did we see any misbehavior on the part of the colored men. And even now, after they have been used by the republican party as political tools and sentiments of hatred to the whites have been carefully instilled into their minds, I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that no race of people, as ignorant, under the same circumstances have behaved so well. It is not prejudice or a feeling of unkindness to the colored man that influences the opposition of the southern white man to this bill, but a sincere desire for the welfare of both races and a wish to live together in peace.

We feel that peace in the South is a necessity to us. Our forbearance under so many provocations ought to satisfy the most skeptical that we are determined if possible to keep the peace. We desire, therefore, to keep away all sources of irritation, all causes of collision, many of which will follow in the train of this bill when it becomes a law.

Who does not know, who knows the colored man, that he would never have desired mixed schools, mixed sittings at hotels, theaters, in cars, in steamboats, and asylums if he had not been industriously taught to demand them, and even now the great body of the race does not desire any such "privileges." In many, I believe in all, of the Southern States they have now the privileges of all except at hotels and in public schools and asylums.

Where is the community in the Northern States which would patronize any hotel where colored men were allowed to come to the same table and sit between man and wife? An attempt to force this on any southern community will endanger the peace of that community. Where is the northern hotel-keeper that would like to be forced to receive colored people and give them mixed sittings with his white guests, if especially the colored guests outnumbered the white, as might be the case in many localities in the South? We are impressed with the belief that the mixture of the two races in lunatic and deaf and dumb asylums will destroy them in the South, and thus break down the most useful and beneficent charitable institutions in our land.

Virginia has striven honestly under a thousand difficulties to give the colored people their rights, but in some particulars, for the good of both races, has given them separate rights. She has established an asylum for colored lunatics, well provided and well governed, the first ever established in the world. But the worst feature of the various amendments to this bill is that providing for mixed public schools. Virginia has only since the war entered upon the free-school system of education, and though by her constitution she was not compelled to enter upon it till 1876, it was taken hold of at once. We in that State felt the necessity of instructing and educating the colored people, and the system inaugurated in 1871 has already attained large proportions. To appreciate fully the progress we have made in public schools you must look at our impoverished condition. A people almost bankrupt have done wonders toward educating the children of both races. By the last annual report of W. H. Ruffner, superintendent of public instruction, pages 122 and 123, it will be seen that the State spent on this new system of education for the last year the following sums:

For rent, fuel, lights, &c.	85,189 15
For pay of superintendents	46,481 33
For pay of treasurers and assessors	23,117 46
For pay or district clerks	14,142 63
Expenses of central office	5,968 21
For real estate, buildings, and repairs	120,348 86
For furniture and school apparatus	11,495 94
Aggregating	1,004,990 02

The school population, page 117:

Colored	199,317

In 1824 the white attendance was only 2 per cent. better than that of the colored, and the colored attendance of 1874 was three per cent. better than the white attendance of 1873. This will show the enormous outlay for the State under the circumstances and the very favorable progress made in educating the colored people. All this has been accomplished under State laws and in separate schools. Why interfere with us? Mixed schools forced upon us by act of Congress will destroy the system of free schools, and in two years there will not be a free school in Virginia.

In this same report of our accomplished and efficient superintendent there is a digest of the reports of county superintendents, commencing on page 42, in many of which expressions like this occur:

But should the civil-rights bill or any bill providing for mixed schools be passed by Congress, the white people of this county will with one voice say "Away with the public-school system."

The superintendent of public instruction, on the subject of mixed schools, makes the following sensible and truthful remarks:

THE COEDUCATION OF THE RACES IMPROPER AS WELL AS IMPOSSIBLE.

By reference to the written reports of the county superintendents (page 42) it will be seen how many of those officers voluntarily mention the "civil-rights bill" as the instrument of inevitable destruction to our school system, if it should pass.

The principles involved in this bill are wide-reaching, and on their right settlement hangs the life of southern civilization, if not the preservation of American liberty. If the school systems of the South be overthrown, the last germ of recuperative energy will have been destroyed; and if the principle be once established that the educational commonwealths of America are to be ruled by a central authority, education becomes the tool of power, and the enslavement of the people must logically follow.

The question of constitutional law involved in the civil-rights bill does not fall within my province; but if it be in accordance with our federative system for the details of State school classification and government to be regulated by Congress, the friends of true education may well pause before they commit themselves further in the direction of public schools. An educational system which is not free in its methods, and which does not develop the people into that mental freedom which is the aim of all true education, is a fraud.

I have strong confidence that this heaviest of the blows will not descend upon us while we in the South are now staggering under other burdens which, of themselves, may crush us. After all the marshaling of facts which has been going on for a twelve months past, it must be generally known that the admixture of whites and blacks in southern schools is simply impossible. The most obvious reason for this is the social disparity, indeed the intense social repugnance, existing between the races—a repugnance far greater than that existing in ordinary society, even where the social scale is longest, and its degrees most deeply graven. This repugnance between the free-born and free-made classes has been shown by reference to history from the earliest times to be an invariable law of society, the operation of which could not be overcome by argument, by statute, or by force. And it has been asserted, though not as fully developed as the subject deserves, that this social repugnance, like social laws generally, has a psychological basis which amply vindicates the law; and consequently that it asserts its power as clearly (though not as strongly) in the case of a community of race between the freedmen and their former masters as where there is diversity; and in the case of equality, as well as inequality of culture, as has been particularly shown by reference to society in the Jewish commonwealth, and in the Greek and Roman Republics—to which might be added the entire social history of Europe. But to this general law in our States there have been added intensifying influences of the strongest character, namely, a wide difference of race and a terrible war. So that, altogether, we have one of the most aggravated cases known to history of social repugnance between two peoples inhabiting the same territory.

For all practical purposes we need not go beyond the fact of this repugnance in arranging the details of public education. We must teach the races in separate schools, or we must abandon public education. Here then is the sharp and decisive point: we will educate the blacks in separate schools, or we will not educate them at all.

Not only will the public free schools be broken up, but our colleges and our noble university, the pride of our State, will languish and maybe die under the baleful influences of this law.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the evil effects of this law, feebly and imperfectly set forth.

What are the good effects? The colored people do not need it, and as a people they do not want it. I am unable to state any good that will flow from its passage. Is it the intention of the majority of this House in usurpation of constitutional authority, in defiance of the protests of nearly all of both parties who will feel its operation, to force upon the South this most obnoxious law? Can it be the design of the republican party to press the southern people to the wall, to provoke collision between the races by forcing distasteful equality between these two races? Can it be that this party desires bloodshed to enkindle afresh the feelings of the North against the South, and thus to obtain a renewal of their lease of power? The organ of the party and of the Administration in this city, the Washington Republican, in its issue on Monday, 2d of February, said in substance that the change of the rule of this House did not mean the passage of the civil-rights bill alone, but the enactment of a series of laws designed to secure to the republican party the one hundred and thirty-eight electoral votes of the Southern States.

Can it be possible that this paper spoke the sentiments of the Administration or of the republican party? Are the southern people, all disposed to peace and patient endurance as they are, to be goaded and kicked into collision? Are they to be forced, in defense of their very manhood and of their wives and children, to repel assaults and to save their own lives be compelled to spill the blood of those who would slay them? Are these things to be seized upon by the dominant party to strangle the lives of our State governments and fill our blighted land once more with blood? God forbid. I trust our people will bear all this for the sake of their country, with the positive assurance that if they are thus patient and forbearing an outraged people will avenge their wrongs by hurling this party from power. I am persuaded that the means to retain or regain their power now being resorted to by the republican party will most certainly insure their complete downfall and will add another illustration of the truth of the sentiment "Whom the gods intend to destroy they first make mad."

Security of Elections.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS J. CASON,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1875.

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. CASON. Mr. Speaker, in the history of political and civil liberty there has never been an hour more pregnant with the weal or woe of human rights, individual liberty, the progress of civilization, enlightenment, and Christianity than the present. From the creation of man, from the hour that Cain smote his brother to this moment there has waged an incessant strife, a continuous battle of selfish intolerance and bigotry. In this battle of wrong against right there has been developed every phase of human nature; where vice, oppression, and crime have raised their bloody forms there have been found the pure, the noble, and the brave, ready at all times with self-sacrificing devotion to right and justice to meet and combat vice, resist oppression, and punish crime.

There has been a wonderful change, improvement, and reformation in the form and essence of civil government, the administration of the law, and social status of the masses of the people in the modern forms of government over that of ages gone by.

Passing along down with time, leaving out of view the ancient forms of government and civilization, and examining into the organization and development of the modern government, we find it easy to trace the terrible struggle between barbarism and civilization, oppression and liberty, aristocracy and democracy.

In this struggle of light and liberty against tyranny, slavery, and prejudice, we find that which gives to the philanthropist a guarantee, a positive assurance of final triumph, ultimate equality, and perfect protection before the law for all people. And were the modern democracy half as zealous in studying history, the progress of civilization, human rights, and liberty as they have been in studying the constitution and by-laws of the Klu-Klux Klans and White Leagues and how they could debase and degrade a downtrodden and lately enslaved people, they would learn the infinitsimal futility of their barbarous and uncivilized efforts to prevent the education, elevation, and enlightenment of a weak and inferior class of citizens. They would learn from the earliest infancy of government down to this good hour that an allwise, omnipresent, omnipotent arm has guided, unerringly directed the perpetual advancement, civilization, and enlightenment of mankind, and fore-ordained by irrevocable decree the equality and liberty of every human being. He that runs can read in the signs of the times from our inheritance of the past that there will not nor can there be one step backward in this grand march of human progress.

Our country has always been to a great extent a refuge for the oppressed and burdened people of all nations, if we except only the African race. The sturdy colonists came from lands of oppression, driven from their homes because of their opinions, and seeking in the wilds of the American wilderness a newly-discovered continent—among the savages a home. Here a grand experiment in the form of government could be tried. A population coming from the four corners of the earth, fleeing from deep prejudices and tyrannical bigotry, could implant the fundamental principles of government; beginning at the foundation of all law, imbued with the inspirations of nature, could enunciate and proclaim to a tyrannized world "That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This was a grand step in advance of any other government heretofore founded.

Unfortunately for the advancement of human progress and civilization, the love of money and power blinded the conscience of our forefathers, misled their judgments, and induced them to enter into the nefarious slave traffic—barter and sell the flesh and blood of human beings as cattle are sold in the market. A large majority of the delegates in the convention that formed our Constitution felt that this "sum of all villainies" had a degrading effect upon the habits, customs, and morals of the Southern States especially, and to a great extent of the entire Union, resolved that the terrible disgrace and stigma upon the people of this country should not be named in or established by the Constitution, but that this sacred instrument should be the fundamental law establishing freedom for freemen.

The increase of the slave population by importation, and especially by propogation, became wonderful in a very few years.

The large increase in slaves, the immense productions of the soil of the South, as well as the peculiar kinds of productions only known to a semi-tropical climate, giving to a great extent a monopoly in the growth of cotton, sugar, and tobacco, and the uncompetitive markets of the world in which to realize unusual profits, soon produced great wealth and power in the southern slave States.

All over the South planters acquired large numbers of slaves; their value and the profits arising from their labor gave great wealth to their owners. The ownership of slaves did away with the necessity of their owners and their families earning their bread by the sweat of their brows. This naturally divided the people into classes. Those who were not required by necessity to labor, and who had time and the means for mental and social culture, neither from necessity were required nor from choice desired to associate and commingle with those whose dependence required them to earn their support by toil and industry. Thus grew into existence caste, at the head of which were a kind of pseudo aristocracy, and the lowest class were what was usually called the poor white trash, the clay-eaters of the South. The monopoly in the peculiar productions of the slave States, their use in every portion of the civilized world, their necessity in every family, their great value and unusual profits in the market, created in the minds of the slaveholders the opinion that these productions gave such a political and commercial power to the people of the South, an independence of all other countries or people, as never before belonged to or had been at the command of any other class or people of any country.

It was the proud boast of the politician of the South that cotton was king; that the movement of the looms of Manchester depended on the supply of this article from the South; that not only the happiness and prosperity of the people of this country and England but of the civilized world depended on the growth and sale of this one commodity; that the resolution of the cotton lords to stop its cultivation would bring the good Queen of England and with her the crowned heads of Europe to their knees, humble suppliants before the cotton-pod owners of the South. It was in these times when the good patriarchs of the peculiar institution were proclaiming cotton king, boasting of their planting slavery on the acme of modern civilization and Christianity, that these gentlemen oftentimes would remind their brethren of the North, "the mudsills of society," that any act questioning that slavery was a divine institution and that it was the saving grace of their country to shoot a Yankee would be regarded as the grossest insult and a violation of the implied obligations of the North toward the South.

The social and political idiosyncrasies that resulted from and grew out of the peculiar agricultural and commercial relations of the South, and the inharmonious and abnormal conditions of her people, produced such arrogance, intolerance, and arbitrary forms of political intercourse unheard of in history.

It is true that in the colonial times the abolition sentiment of the people of the colony of Virginia was strong and they petitioned the mother country against the traffic of slavery, and it was set out in the proclamation of this colony as one of the grounds of complaint and reasons for separating from the mother country. Yet in less than the allotted span of life, three-score years and ten, the ownership of man had become a stepping-stone to and a sure guarantee for social and political standing and advancement, and all men were considered as elevated and took rank with his fellow-man in the ratio of the number of his slaves. Freedom and intolerance were allowed in everything except the question of slavery. To call in question the right to own and to possess slaves either by speech, action, or deed would ostracize an individual socially and condemn him to associate with the white trash; indeed, a man was regarded as fortunate if he was allowed to remain in the country; often he met with the mob, was introduced to the whipping-post and tar-barrel, rode out of the country on a rail, or sent to the other world by a pistol or a musket shot. In a greater portion of the South no arguments or speeches were allowed that brought in question this institution. The free-soil press of the North was excluded, laws passed prohibiting the education of the blacks and the imprisonment of any person found teaching them, the patrol established all over the South, and a police serveillance over both white and black worse than any military despotism known to the world. A people peculiarly sensitive to liberty in all other things became as to that abject tools, suppliant adulators of the slave-holding aristocracy. Self-opinion and individual ideas and action were completely merged in the hands that controlled this institution, while the mob, the pistol, and bowie-knife held sway.

With the exception of the wealthy, education and literature were neglected, and instead of culture and refinement, the mass of the youth of the country were brought up in comparative idleness. Labor was taught to be degrading. It was conclusive evidence of low caste and social condition to work for a living. The nature of the slave management tended to bring on a level the laborer with the slave. It was the struggling manhood of the honest toiler doled out in competition with forced and unrequited labor. It was manhood competing with the lashed and driven slave.

The ban on labor produced idleness, the want of occupation caused the young men of the country to become restless, daring, and reckless, ready for the organization of Ku-Klux Klans and White Leagues, and inflamed by spirituous liquors ready subjects for the mob and the use of murderous weapons. In what I have said I have but feebly portrayed the outline of facts, the condition of the Southern States upon the breaking out of the rebellion. In fact I may say this condition of things was the cause of the rebellion and all of its terrible consequences.

It was this condition of society that made it possible to commit the outrages upon the Union soldiers and Union southerners during the rebellion; that made it possible to tolerate such incarnate fiends as the commandants of Libby and Andersonville. And no person who saw large numbers of confederate soldiers together during the war could fail to observe the terrible corroding marks of the institution of slavery and the effect of misguided social laws upon the poorer class of these soldiers. I am sure that I am corroborated and sustained by the fears and forebodings of every intelligent northern man who observed these bodies of soldiers for the success of our Government in the reorganization and re-establishment of law, order, and peaceful government in the Southern States at the close of the rebellion.

The question that so earnestly presented itself at that time was how can there be a permanent government of law, social advancement, the pursuit of industry, education, established, peace and order created, fostered, and perpetuated by men who from their infancy have been made to believe and have had bred into their very beings a kind of Don Quixotic chivalry that it was evidence of the highest existence to persecute men for their opinions, to sustain their views of law and right at the point of deadly weapons, and whose very instincts of humanity and generosity have been blinded by the every-day cry of the oppressed slave and the clank of his festering chains.

Mr. Speaker, when the gentlemen on the other side tell us that the reorganization of the governments of the South have been failures I ask them to tell me when and where in the last thirty years have the governments of the States of the South been a success? Has their success been in the degradation of labor, in the tyrannical proscription for conscientious belief and opinion, in the establishment of caste and aristocracy formed on the ownership of human beings?

When has it been otherwise in the South than might made right, when the wealthy did not tyrannize over the poor, when flagrant vices and immoralities did not stalk abroad in noon-day, and winked at by church and state? How could it be expected that the element that I have named, being a large class of southern society, would be controlled by an order of things that they have been taught to hate and despise, brought on a level with a class regarded as barely human and treated as having no rights a white man was bound to respect? If the governments of the South since the war have in any respect proved failures, I assert that they have been made so by men of the South; that it is they that have violated law and order, made night hideous with the shrieks of their murdered victims, and the world stand aghast with their crimes.

Again, the pretext on which these wrongs are perpetrated are not on the demand for some great right, some fundamental principle of liberty, the promulgation of some grand magna charta granting to all of God's created humanity from all nations, regardless of color or creed, the full protection of law and guarantee of peace. Nay, Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, these violations of human rights and the debasement of all the nobler sentiments of mankind have all, every one—no single exception—been perpetrated in the interest and for the purpose of keeping alive, sustaining deep-seated, dark, demoniacal prejudice of caste and color; a war against freedom of opinion, individual and personal rights, to do and to think for one's self.

What have the Southern States to boast of in good government before the war? Their settlements began early in the history of the country, and, as I have stated, their natural resources are unequaled. Their broad rivers furnish immense water lines of communication and unlimited water privileges; the finest soil, covered with gigantic forests of most valuable timber and mineral resources of almost every character. These advantages combined together exist nowhere else on the face of this earth. With a climate in which man may work almost every day in the year and which allows the production of almost every known fruit and vegetable; a soil that grows these productions in vast quantities, delicious in character, with less preparation and cultivation than in almost any other country. Many of these productions are so very valuable and demanding such ready sale as to cause the neglect of others almost as profitable. There is nothing that man needs on this earth for food, luxuries, clothing, or of a mechanical character but what may be grown, produced, or manufactured in those States. These people could live isolated from all other people and enjoy the highest refinement and unusual luxuries. With the frugality and thrift of the people of the European countries these people could have amassed wealth to an almost fabulous extent.

With all the advantages which I have but feebly sketched, where are these people to-day, where were they before the war compared with their less-favored brethren of the Northern States, whose farmers in some of these States work one-half of the year to procure food for themselves, families, and stock the other half? In agriculture the southern people have always been behind the times, relying principally on their monopoly in the production of certain articles. Their machinery and mode of cultivation is almost as primitive as in the days of Noah. Compare the Ohio farmer's fine polished steel plow, the Illinois farmer's buggy-cultivator, in which he day after day rides and plows his growing grain, with the North Carolina farmer who has cut his plow frame out of the fork of a tree, using its natural growth and shape for a plow, and observe his blooming daughter as she mounts a seatless two-wheeled cart, to which she has attached an ox between two poles for shafts and harnessed with a shuck collar and three old straps of leather, one across his back and one on each side, and tow ropes for lines, trots her bovine away to market at the rate of six miles per hour, and you have a just comparison in agriculture between the North and the South, and certainly one you would meet with many times should you traverse these countries. These people are as much behind the age in manufactures as in agriculture.

Until since the war there were few manufactories that deserved the name as such, everything having to be purchased from the North or imported. I may say the same as to commerce. With harbors and inland waters equal to any other country, at least nine-tenths of all they consumed of a foreign character was imported through northern markets. As to internal improvements, there were not as many miles of railroads in the entire slave States at the commencement of the war as there were in the young State of Illinois. The same want of energy is true as to all other kinds of internal improvements of the South; also true as to public enterprises of all kinds.

This brings me to notice the social and moral standing of these people. From the demands that have been made by the South, from the assertions of superior order and caste of the southern people, we would expect to find somewhere the data to sustain these claims and the proof to uphold them. But how do the facts sustain their assertions as to social and moral standing? Here let me ask, where were the school systems when the war broke out? What State had a free-school system? And while there has been great increase and improvement in the school systems of the Southern States since the war, yet there is not at this time a single State that can be said to have a fully organized free-school system.

As illustrating the social status and condition of the Southern States I will here give, as shown by the census of 1870, the population of eleven States from each section of the country of ten years of age and over, with the number that are illiterate, together with the population between ten and twenty-one years old and the number of illiterate of these ages. I shall leave a comparison by my hearers as the best possible comment, simply saying that perhaps nothing more fully demonstrates the social and political systems under which the people of the two sections have been educated and have grown up as citizens, and fully demonstrates a lesson that the southern people should learn and profit from:

Statement showing the population and number of illiterate, &c., of eleven Southern and eleven Northern States.

As a further illustration of the character of the governments in the South as compared with other parts of the United States, we find by reference to the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1872 that the illiterate condition of her people causes a large portion of her crimes. In New York and Pennsylvania the illiterate criminals were from 4 per cent. to 33 per cent. In the Central Western States they were from 3½ per cent to 46 per cent. In the West and Pacific States they were from 3 per cent. to 31 per cent. In the Southern States they were from 22 per cent. to 60 per cent. This wonderful difference can only be accounted for from the character of their institutions. This question is illustrated still further by the circulation of the press in the two parts of the Union, as shown by the census of 1870. Compare the circulation of all classes of papers in ten States from each section, as follows:

State.	Number.	Copies annually issued.
Arkansas	56	1,824,860

We might also ask was it good government that drove from their homes millions of white laborers, the poor, hardy tiller of the soil, thousands of whom were parents trembling in fear of the examples daily surrounding their homes and families in a country where society and labor, the one contaminated with and the other controlled by a vicious system of slavery? This emigration was further caused by the intolerance of the votaries of slavery, the degradation of labor, and the social ostracism of the poor white.

Mr. Speaker, go with me to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and almost anywhere in the broad northwestern land, and there you will find the bone and muscle of the slave States, men who despised the social wrongs and crimes there existing, who wished to raise their families where their strong arms and browned faces—their manhood—was respected and encouraged. These men and their families have been driven from their homes and the graves of their ancestors, banished as completely as by the edict of a monarch. Tell me, was it the carpet-bag governments that thus emasculated the Southern States? Ah, sir, the North, wiser in this than the South, have utilized these thousands and millions of carpet-baggers, and as a result they are to a large extent the ruling class of many of the Northern States.

To-day the question comes home to us as an American Congress, What shall be done to insure a republican form of government to protect the American citizen in his rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution and laws of the land? Were it not for this prejudice, as I have already said, there would be no trouble in the South, no mismanagement of the people; all their wrongs and troubles come alone from this. And on this question we find absolute intolerance. At almost every point in the Southern States we find anarchy, murder, and mob violence holding full sway; all pretext that other causes have brought about this condition of things is false. The charge that carpet-baggers and scalawags have inaugurated this "rule and ruin" is as contemptible as its imbecility will allow or give it weight. The charge in the face of the present and past tyrannical control of the country by a self-elected class and caste has neither dignity nor the appearance of truth. It is and has been the rule of those to the manner born that has depopulated and retarded in growth the country, despoiled it of its wealth a thousand times more by forcing the emigration of their people than the ravages of the terrible war of four years' unparalleled destruction.

The charges of the democratic opposition that there has been usurpation of power by the executive department of the Government is untrue. We have but a few years back emerged from a state of revolution, with the rebellious States in anarchy, and without legal governments, and their people covered with treason. The Joint Committee on Reconstruction, in their unanimous report to the Thirty-ninth Congress, say:

> They were in a state of utter exhaustion, having protracted their struggle against Federal authority until all hope of successful resistance had ceased and laid down their arms only because there was no longer any power to use them. * * * They were also necessarily in a state of complete anarchy, without governments and without the power to frame governments except by the permission of those who had been successful in the war.

In other words, these States were to be rehabilitated with legal governments republican in form. If the General Government had power to do this or in any respect to guarantee such governments, it was then and is yet its duty, regardless of the time it may take, to secure these States not only loyal and republican governments in form and theory, but in fact and in practice; governments that do in all respects give protection and safety to life and property, to person and rights—the end for which governments have been and are instituted among men to subserve. Should our Government stop short of this it will fail in its highest mission and most sacred trust.

I am sure if the Government has erred it is because of not having assumed and exercised other and greater powers, and not for the reason it has to some extent used its beneficent force in the protection of the weak and poor and the enforcement of law and right. We have abundant example under democratic rule at times when the civil administration of the governments was in full force and ample in its protection of the rights of every one, and where there were no revolutionary governments and quasi military powers to set aside and loyal governments established, and at the time when our Constitution did not provide in express terms that the Government must not only secure governments republican in form, but that Congress might enforce by appropriate legislation such form of governments.

Mr. Speaker, the right of self-protection and perpetuation is a right inherent in every form of government. It is the very essence of government, and is as fully implanted and as impliedly understood in right, as if it was named over and over again in its fundamental law. That government that contains within its own body-politic principles which either by their enforcement or which by their provisions prevent its own protection is no government at all, and can in no respect be regarded of any higher order than a compact or copartnership. In fact, such an organization, having within itself such elements of dissolution, could not from its nature be considered anything else than a copartnership. I need not stop to multiply examples of the former exercise of the executive control or military interference with persons or associations committing acts that are in conflict with the due exercise of sovereignty by the General Government or that have a tendency to disloyalty.

It is generally understood that democrats regard General Jackson as being almost if not quite infallible, and yet General Grant has in no respect interfered with local or State governments to the extent that Jackson did. Take the case of Judge Hall at New Orleans. This has always been regarded as one of the greatest acts of General Jackson's life. It has undoubtedly been the subject of more eulogy by democratic orators than any other act of his life. It was Judge Douglas's great effort in defense of General Jackson's conduct in that case that placed him in the front rank of the orators of that party. On the 15th day of December, 1815, General Jackson issued his proclamation establishing martial law, yet there had not at that time been a single overt act of disloyalty; the most that could be said was a suspicion that some of the inhabitants of that city were not very loyal to this Government. On the 5th day of March following he arrested Mr. Louaillier, on a charge of having published in a newspaper an appeal to the French citizens, in which it was claimed he stimulated them to a disobedience of General Jackson's orders. This was all; compare it with some of the publications in newspapers of of these times. Mr. Louaillier was at the time of his arrest a citizen and member of the State Legislature, then in session, and he was then in the city attending its labors. He applied for a writ of habeas corpus on the day of his arrest, and Judge Hall immediately issued the writ as asked for. Immediately upon the issue of the writ by the judge, General Jackson ordered his arrest and his confinement in the military prison. When General Jackson declared martial law the courts were in the full exercise of all of their functions, and had in no respect been interfered with. When Mr. Louaillier was arrested, he was in attendance on the Legislature, so that both he and the judge were prevented from attending to their official duties for several days. The publication in the newspaper, the arrest of Mr. Louaillier and Judge Hall, all took place after General Jackson had received a report that a treaty of peace had been signed with Great Britain, and on the day following the arrest, the 6th of March, he received a more positive and certain notice of the treaty being signed. He however retained his prisoners in custody for some days, and then sent them under guard beyond his lines, with orders not to return until proclamation of peace.

It would be an insult to the intelligence of this House to speak of any of the orders or acts of General Grant as being parallel with this act of General Jackson; yet he, although going so far beyond General Grant, is and has been lauded to the skies by the entire democratic party, while in the same breath they abuse General Grant as a villain and tyrant. Such is the honesty of that party.

every form of government, without any terms expressly stating this

I desire also to briefly call your attention to the case of General Sumner, invading and dispersing both houses of a Kansas Legislature:

Colonel Sumner, afterward General Sumner, was put under orders from Washington, and on the 4th of July, 1856, while the members of the Legislature were in their respective halls waiting for the hour of noon, to be called to order, according to a previous adjournment, Colonel Sumner and his troops appeared. At his right was the military band, and close behind about two hundred dragoons in three squadrons. The military battle-flag was afloat. The soldiers were drawn up around the hall and along the street facing it, and one hundred yards off were two cannon posted so as to command the street, and gunners were stationed by them ready for the word to fire. An army surgeon was also conspicuous with his case of instruments! This disposition having been made, three other companies of dragoons approached the town from an opposite direction from which those stationed had come. Just before twelve o'clock Colonel Sumner entered the hall and went up to the platform. The first clerk, Mr. Tappan, proceeded to call the roll, when Colonel Sumner said:

"Gentlemen, I am here to perform the most painful duty of my whole life. Under the authority of the President's proclamation, I am here to disperse this Legislature, and therefore inform you that you cannot meet. I therefore order you to disperse. God knows that I have no party feeling in this matter, and will hold none so long as I occupy my present position in Kansas."

Judge Schuyler, a member, asked, "Are we to understand that the Legislature are driven out at the point of the bayonet?" "I shall use all the force at my command to carry out my orders!" was the reply. The representatives then dispersed, and the officer proceeded to the senate chamber and ordered the clearance of that body. "My orders are that you must not be permitted to meet, and I cannot allow you to do any business," said Colonel Sumner. The presence of the troops was enough. Mr. Pillsbury said, "Colonel Sumner, we are in no condition to resist the United States troops, and if you order us to disperse, we must disperse." Colonel Allen suggested that this be taken as the expression of all members, and this was assented to. Colonel Sumner then left the hall, and the dragoons were filed away.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to another instance of democratic rule and usurpation; and in looking over the able and eloquent speech lately delivered by Senator LOGAN on the discussion of this question in the other end of this Capitol, I find the following statement which I have taken the liberty to incorporate in my remarks:

I have another piece of history here that probably will be of some information to our well-informed democrats who have been talking so loudly about military usurpation. I have shown you that they elected one President—they elected him twice—who was one of these military usurpers. Let me read a little history about another military usurper, and for the benefit of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON.] I wish he was here. He forgot this the other day, although he is a Senator from that State. Here is a little order that I hold in my hand dated, "Headquarters of the Army of the Potomac, Washington, September 11, 1861," addressed to General Banks, a conservative independent member of the next House of Congress:

GENERAL: After full consultation with the President, Secretaries of State, War, &c., it has been decided to effect the operation proposed for the 17th. Arrangements have been made to have a Government steamer at Annapolis to receive the prisoners and carry them to their destination.

Some four or five of the chief men in the affair are to be arrested to-day. When they meet on the 17th you will please have everything prepared to arrest the whole party, and be sure that none escape.

It is understood that you arranged with General Dix and Governor Seward the modus operandi. It has been intimated to me that the meeting might take place on the 14th; please be prepared. I would be glad to have you advise me frequently of your arrrngements in regard to this very important matter.

If it is successfully carried out it will go far toward breaking the back-bone of the rebellion. It would probably be well to have a special train quietly prepared to take prisoners to Annapolis.

I leave this exceedingly important affair to your tact and discretion, and have but one thing to impress upon you—the absolute necessity of secrecy and success.

With the highest regard, I am, my dear general, your sincere friend,

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General, United States Army.

Now, what was this order for? To arrest the Maryland Legislature.

Mr. CONKLING. And Maryland had not been declared in insurrection.

Mr. LOGAN. And Maryland had not been declared in secession. General Banks issued his instructions, which I will read, to Lieutenant-Colonel Ruger, commanding the Third Wisconsin Regiment:

"SIR: The Legislature of Maryland is appointed to meet in special session tomorrow, Tuesday, September 16. It is not impossible that the members, or a portion of them, may be deterred from meeting there on account of certain arrests recently made in Baltimore. It is also quite possible that on the first day of meeting the attendance may be small. Of the facts as to this matter I shall see that you are well informed as they transpire. It becomes necessary that any meeting of this Legislature at any place or time shall be prevented.

"You will hold yourself and your command in readiness to arrest the members of both houses. A list of such as you are to detain will be inclosed to you herewith, among whom are to be especially included the presiding officers of the two houses, secretaries, clerks, and all subordinate officials. Let the arrests be certain, and allow no chance of failure. The arrests should be made while they are in session, I think."

There is the order. The arrest shall be made while they are in session.

"You will, upon the receipt of this, quietly examine the premises. I am informed that escape will be impossible if the entrance to the building be held by you. Of that you will judge upon examination. If no session is to be held, you will arrest such members as can be found in Frederick. The process of arrest should be to enter both houses at the same time, announcing that they were arrested by orders of the Government; command them to remain as they are subject to your orders.

"Any resistance will be forcibly suppressed, whatever the consequences. Upon these arrests being effected, the members that are to be detained will be placed on board a special train for Annapolis, where a steamer will await them."

There is the order of General George B. McClellan, a democrat; there is the instruction of General Banks, an independent member of the next Congress; and there is the arrest of the Maryland Legislature by the order of the general commanding, and you ran him for President the first chance you got afterward. And yet you are violently opposed to these arrests! How strange it is that all of these arrests, all of these usurpations, all of these outrages heretofore in this country have been committed by democrats and men who have been sustained by democrats, and yet to-day the mere authorizing of men to perform their duty under the law by an officer of the Army has caused one of the greatest commotions that ever was known in the democrat tea-pot in this country.

Notwithstanding what may have been democratic, we are told that General Grant has erred in his management and administration of the rebellious States. But, Mr. Speaker, who says General Grant has erred? The democratic party says he has, and so said that party the same of the noble-hearted Lincoln, and so they said of the Union soldiers as they cursed them for Lincoln hirelings.

And so does every unrepenting rebel in all our land say the President has erred. Jeff Davis says so. Every broken-down, spavined politician in the country says so. Every sore-headed, weak-kneed Greeley liberal says the same thing, as does every disappointed, discontented political adventurer.

Mr. Speaker, no true republican says General Grant has intentionally erred. No truly loyal and patriotic man says he has. All unite in sentiment with the President when he says in his late message to this Congress, that—

If error has been committed by the Army in these matters, it has been on the side of the preservation of good order and the maintenance of law and the protection of life.

While if there has been error committed, who has caused it? If there had been no assaults, no murders, mobs, and fraudulent elections, there would have been no army used to interfere with the rights or occupation of any one. It has been caused by the brutal, tyrannical rule of a set of desperadoes in many parts of the South, by a disobedience of all law, the invasion of every right, and the subversion of every principle of humanity and justice. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Army has been used for the prevention of murders, mobs, and assaults; for the protection of the sacred right to vote, act, and think for one's self as a freeman, without molestation and fear, and for the preservation of peace and good order. And in no instance has any person been wronged or oppressed. In that which has taken place the President has done all from the purest motives and noblest inpirations; and as he has passed through this great drama of his life by day and by night there has gone up from every corner of this land, from every church, and from every hovel, the prayers of the good, the pure, and humanity-loving people, bidding him God speed in his noble mission of protecting the weak and poor and enforcing law, order, and peace throughout the entire country.

In the slave States there are 888,372 square miles of land, the finest soil in the world, a climate remarkable for its salubrity and healthfulness. The southern portion of our country has in many respects advantages over the Northern States, and especially so in climate and soil. A farmer ought, with the same market as in the North, save one-half more in profits than in the Northern and Eastern States, and his advantages in raising stock are even greater than in grain. I am sure I only state the sentiments and feelings of nearly or perhaps full one-half of the farming and mechanical citizens of the North when I assert that they would like to emigrate to some one of the Southern States. It is the common expression of a large portion of the Northern people that if society and government was right in the South they would soon be found living in that country. With thousands and thousands of these people it is a passion and earnest longing for the enjoyments of the more equable climate and fertile soil of the South.

Ah! remember when you raise the fiendish howl of carpet-bagger that hundreds and thousands of the brave boys in blue who had for two or three winters tasted and realized the enjoyment of a temperate climate and the advantages of the southern country, earnestly yearn for the time to come when they, as American citizens, can cast their lot in the South and enjoy the same equality and exercise the same social and political privileges under which they were born and taught to believe right in their northern homes. And it has gone into history that many, many of those brave heroes, with their wives and little ones, and their earthly possessions which, through years of toil, with strong, brave hearts and sturdy arms they had gathered together, have settled on southern soil, where in their fond hopes they had expected to gather around their humble homes sufficient of the necessaries of life to satisfy their frugal wants and to enjoy in the midst of their families the quiet and peace of a good old age to go down to their graves.

Alas, they soon found that the flag that had floated over them in Sherman's grand march to the sea, that flag which gave them victory in the struggle to save the country to the Union, in which they now sought to make their peaceful homes, neither gave nor secured to them the commonest rights—those which belong to the weakest and poorest of human beings. These men, soldiers of the grandest military struggle on earth, were driven from their adopted homes in the land that had cost the blood of nearly one-half million of their northern brethren and the treasure of this great nation to save and preserve. This is the Government that southern prestige gives to freemen, which we are asked to foster and keep in power, protect in crushing out thought and right, liberty and justice. This is the Government as to which Mr. Sidney Anderson, a correspondent of the Boston Advertiser and Chicago Tribune, who had spent a good deal of time in the South, testified before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction of the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, and detailed a confession of a leading gentleman of Georgia that should awaken a sleeping nation to the true condition of the poor people of both colors in the South. This statement, made early in the year 1866, demonstrates the true condition of the country at that time. Mr. Sidney Anderson testified:

I met a gentleman whose name I do not feel at liberty to give. He was a very intelligent man, of forty or forty-five years of age, who had served as a captain in the rebel army and was a lawyer by profession. I was introduced to him simply as a gentleman from the North. He had no knowledge of the fact that I was a correspondent. He said: "I have not much faith in the idea that capital and labor will reconcile themselves. Things are exceptional here. Our capital is all in the hands of a few and invested in great plantations. Our labor is all in the hands of a race supremely ignorant and against whom we all have a strong prejudice. In my opinion you cannot reconcile these two interests, unless you put the labor in subjection to the capital—that is, unless you give the white man control of the negro. Of course that can't be allowed, and therefore there's an almost impassable gulf between the negro and freedom unless the Government aids him. I'll tell you what I think you should have done. The policy of confiscation should be rigidly carried out at once. Mercy to the individual is death to the State, and in pardoning all the leading men the President is killing the free State he might have built here. The landed aristocracy have always been the curse of the State. I say that as a man born and reared in Georgia and bound to her by every possible tie. Till that is broken down there can be no real freedom here for either the negro or the poor white. * * * * * *

"I have sometimes thought I would go North and urge your people to take the first fruits of the victory; but I should not dare come back here after speaking up there. I have wanted to write a letter to some leading newspaper, but if I should say what I honestly believe I should be killed if it ever got out that I wrote it. There is not any freedom of speech here or anywhere in the State, unless you speak just as the secessionists please to let you. I should be shot before to-morrow morning if I should say publicly what I have said to you. Take the troops away and off the great lines of travel, there would be a reign of terror in a month. * * *

"The negro's first want is not the ballot but a chance to live. Yes, sir; a chance to live. * * * I tell you he's not got his freedom yet, and isn't likely to get it right away. Why, he can't even live without the consent of the white man. He has no land; he can make no crops except the white man gives him a chance. He hasn't any timber; he can't get a stick of wood without leave from a white man. We crowd him into the fewest possible employments, and then he can scarcely get work anywhere but in the rice-fields and cotton plantations of the white man, who has owned him and given up slavery only at the point of the bayonet. Even in this city he can't get a pail of water from a well without asking a white man for the privilege. He can hardly breathe, and he certainly can't live in a house unless a white man gives his consent. What sort of freedom is that? * * * 'Tisn't such whippings as he told you about that most wrong the negro. It is the small, endless, mean, little injustice of every day that's going to kill him off. He's only partially protected now; take the troops away, and his chance wouldn't be as good as a piece of light-wood in a house on fire. Yes; I know there's talk of selling them into slavery again, but I don't see how you got hold of it. I know a good many of these men they've sent to the Legislature, and I know there'll be private talk this session, even if there isn't open effort, to make the penal code take him back into the condition of slavery. It'll be called involuntary servitude for the punishment of crime, but it won't differ much from slavery."

The statements here made are fully sustained by the very able report of the joint committee I have heretofore mentioned and from which I have taken them. The committee say:

Hardly is the war closed before the people of these insurrectionary States come forward and haughtily claim as a right the privilege of participating at once in that Government which they had for four years been fighting to overthrow. Allowed and encouraged by the Executive to organize State governments, they at once placed in power leading rebels, unrepentant and unpardoned, excluding with contempt those who had manifested attachment to the Union, and preferring in many instances those who had rendered themselves the most obnoxious. * * * The evidence of an intense hostility to the Federal Union and an equally intense love of the late confederacy, nurtured by the war, is decisive.

While it appears that nearly all are willing to submit, at least for the time being, to Federal authority, it is equally clear that the ruling motive is a desire to obtain the advantages which will be derived from a representation in Congress. Officers of the Union Army on duty, and northern men who go South to engage in business are generally detested and proscribed. Southern men who adhered to the Union are bitterly hated and relentlessly persecuted. In some localities prosecutions have been instituted in State courts against Union officers for acts done in the line of official duty, and similar prosecutions are threatened elsewhere as soon as the United States troops are removed.

The committee further say:

The conciliatory measures of the Government do not seem to have been met even half-way. The bitterness and defiance exhibited toward the United States under such circumstances is without a parallel in the history of the world. In return for our leniency we receive only an insulting denial of our authority.

The State central committee of the Union party of Tennessee, on the 9th day of January 1866, say, among other things, the following:

The predominant feeling of those lately in rebellion is that of deep-seated hatred, amounting in many cases to a spirit of revenge, toward the white Unionist of the State and a haughty contempt for the negro, whom they cannot treat as a free man.

Again, they say:

A party exists in the State which is every day becoming more compact and powerful and which sympathizes with the men and principles of the rebellion. It commands every agency to operate on public opinion.

Again:

It is a sad delusion and a dangerous mistake to suppose this hatred of loyalty, contempt for the negro, and alienation from the Government, are confined to the politicians or leaders, as they are termed, and that the common people have been all the time loyal.

From this evidence—and it is a mere citation from the volumes upon volumes we might give, and which have been made public to the world—we find in all of the extreme southern States anarchy and revolution existing all over the country. We find this condition of things immediately after the attempt of the Government to reorganize the States so lately in rebellion, and this so soon that there is not a shadow of a pretext that the reorganized governments have had time to demonstrate their want of justness or wisdom.

As asserted in what I have already said, we find that things have only been going from bad to worse, showing the deep-seated prejudice of these people against a government free to all, an organized determination, a well-drilled conspiracy, to consummate by fraud and conspiracy what they failed to gain by the bayonet. In support of this fact take the case of the State of Arkansas: An election for governor and State officers carried by bare-faced and open fraud, and the legally elected officers thrust from office and their places filled by guilty usurpers, the Constitution by force and fraud annulled and abrogated, and in its place one adopted that violates the condition upon which the State was readmitted into the Union. As to how this was all consummated, I beg leave to refer the House to the minority report of the committee appointed by this House at its last session to investigate the affairs of that State. In making this reference to the minority report, I do so for the reason that the conclusions therein contained are not denied or dissented from by the entire committee, but in fact, as I shall show, are fully corroborated by the whole committee, democrats as well as republicans. Mr. WARD, in his able report, says:

The whole proceedings were void because of the violations of all law; the frauds, violence, and intimidations practiced by Baxter and his co-conspirators, and that the election to revise the constitution was held in violation of the existing constitution; that the convention, if properly called, exceeded its powers, and the election to ratify its work was void; and it cannot be successfully contended that the people of Arkansas have in any legal way, under any forms of law, expressed their wish to overthrow the constitution of 1868 or to set up the present usurpation. If banditti or a mob of armed men may take possession of a State, depose its officers, arrest its judges, close its courts, intimidate its people through violence and murder, provide its own way of holding and its own officers to hold elections, and its own officers to declare the result, and the fruits of such defiance of all law are binding upon the people of such State and upon Congress, then the present pretended government of Arkansas is legitimate, and must be recognized as such, but not otherwise.

I have said the majority of the committee do not contradict or deny the facts set forth by Mr. WARD. Here is what they say:

In all or nearly all of these omitted counties and precincts the majority of votes was given for Brooks. The whole proceeding by many of those having official charge of the registration, voting, and returning of the votes is characterized by the grossest unfairness and dishonesty; and instead of an honest effort to ascertain the will of the voters, they endeavored by every possible means to secure the ascendency of their own party friends. Without going more into detail, the committee are unanimously of opinion that by a fair and honest return and count of the votes actually given at the election Brooks was elected governor, and of right should have been so declared.

The majority of the committee in another part of their report assert the right of Brooks to be governor, but say that—

The committee are satisfied that no one holding office under the old constitution who should have attempted to hold on to his position and test the question of his right could have done so without great danger to his life, and therefore ought not to be treated as having surrendered any right by acquiescence.

Such is the unanimous opinion of the committee as to the government of Arkansas. Such will be your boasted white man's governments of all these late rebellious States, if the strong arm of the Government is not brought to bear heavily and successfully against the infamous conspiracy and revolution to control and suppress the voice and will of the people by fraud.

Here let me ask, why is it we have not heard coming up from the democratic side of this House a howl of indignation against the outrages perpetrated against Brooks and the other legally elected officers of that State? Let me answer, simply because to do so would be to support the equality of all mankind before the law, defend the poor, and affirm the right of self-government. Ah, it would do more; it would offend the self-constituted aristocratic white ruling class of that State, of the men who have all over the South usurped by force and fraud the offices of their country and the rule of the people. But this they may defend by democratic precedent. For the history of that party convicts it of willingly bowing the supple knee, and without any exception doing the bidding of the wealthy few in tyrannizing over the many and by force oppressing the weak and poor.

I have so far confined myself in exhibiting the condition of things in the South to facts and occurrences taking place early after the war closed. I shall now call your attention to evidence, though briefly given, that overwhelmingly shows that things have only gone from bad to worse, and as conclusively proves that the rebellious spirits of these States will never cease in their determination to drive out and exterminate every vestige of liberty and self-government of the blacks and poor whites.

Brigadier-General Fessenden reports:

A spirit of bitterness and persecution manifests itself toward the negroes. They are shot and abused, outside the immediate protection of our forces, by men who announce their determination to take the law into their own hands, in defiance of our authority. To protect the negro and punish these still rebellious individuals it will be necessary to have their country pretty thickly settled with soldiers.

* * * * * * *

The habit is so inveterate with a great many persons as to render on the least provocation the impulse to whip a negro almost irresistible. It will continue to be so until the southern people will have learned, so as never to forget it, that a black man has rights which a white man is bound to respect.

So far the spirit of persecution has shown itself so strong as to make the protection of the freedman by the military arm of the Government in many localities necessary—in almost all desirable.

The following is from the Shreveport Times of July 9:

If a single hostile gun is fired between the whites and blacks in this and surrounding parishes, every carpet-bagger and scalawag that can be caught will in twelve hours therefrom be dangling from a limb. We do not say this in a spirit of braggadocio; we say it in the interest of peace, and we know what we are talking about.

The following is from the Natchitoches Vindicator of July 18, addressed to colored citizens:

On the other hand, should you imagine that the teaching of your former rulers is correct, and you elect to attempt, for it will only be an attempt, to continue their rule, then you must take the consequences. For we tell you now, and let it be distinctly remembered, that you have fair warning, that we intend to carry the State of Louisiana in November next, or she will be a military Territory.

The following is from the Mansfield Reporter of July 4 and July 11:

There is nothing to be gained by pleadings or concessions, but everything is within our reach, if we will move forward and grasp it. Let our actions be such that everybody will know what we want, and let them see that we are in earnest and are determined to carry out the programme, regardless of the consequences.

The lines must be drawn at once, before our opponents are thoroughly organized, for by this means we will prevent many milk-and-cider fellows from falling into the enemy's ranks. While the white man's party guarantees the negro all of his present rights, they do not intend that white carpet-baggers and renegades shall be permitted to organize and prepare the negroes for the coming campaign. Without the assistance of these villains the negroes are totally incapable of effectually organizing themselves, and unless they are previously excited and drilled, one-half of them will not come to the polls, and a large percentage of the remainder will vote the white man's ticket.

The following is from the Alexandria Democrat of July 15:

The people have determined that the Kellogg government has to be gotten rid of, and they will not scruple about the means, as they have done in the past."

The following is from the Shreveport Times of July 29:

There has been some red-handed work done in this parish that was necessary, but it was evidently done by cool, determined, and just men, who knew just how far to go, and we doubt not if the same kind of work is necessary it will be done.

We say again that we fully, cordially approve what the white men of Grant and Rapides did at Colfax; the white man who does not is a creature so base that he shames the worst class of his species. We say again, we are going to carry the elections in this State next fall.

I have here a pamphlet published, containing extracts from one of the papers in the State of Louisiana, the New Orleans Times, and I will read from it in regard to the massacre at Colfax:

Sunday night, shortly after dark, the boat landed at a wood-pile about a mile above Colfax, Grant Parish, and a young fellow, armed to the teeth and very much excited, came aboard and requested the captain to land at Colfax and take some wounded white men to Alexandria, about twenty-five miles farther down the river.

On arriving at Colfax we found about a hundred armed men on the bank, and most of the passengers, myself among the number, went ashore to view the "battle-ground," for our friend who came aboard at the wood-pile informed us "that if we wanted to see dead niggers here was a chance, for there were a hundred or so scattered over the village and the adjacent fields," and he kindly offered to guide us to the scene of action.

Almost as soon as we got to the top of the landing sure enough we began to stumble on them, most of them lying on their faces, and, as I could see by the dim light of the lanterns, riddled with bullets.

One poor wretch, a stalwart-looking fellow, had been in his burning court-house and as he ran out with his clothes on fire had been shot. His clothes to his waist were all burned off, and he was literally broiled.

We come upon bodies every few steps, but the sight of this fellow who was burned, added to the horrible smell of burning human flesh—the remains of those who were shot in the court-house which was still on fire—sickened most of us, and caused a general cry of "Let's go back."

I counted eighteen of the misguided darkies, and was informed that they were not one-fourth of the number killed; that they were scattered here and there in the fields around the town, besides several in and around the burning court-house. This, however, was probably an exaggeration.

To show how terribly incensed the people were against the negroes, I relate these incidents:

We came across one negro whose clothes were smoking, and who had probably been in the fire. Some of our party remarked that he was alive. Instantly one of our guides whipped out a six-shooter, saying, "I'll finish the black dog." Of course we remonstrated and he put away his weapon. Some one stooped down and turned the negro over. He was stiff and cold.

A few minutes afterward we came on a big fellow who was reclining on his elbow and to all appearances alive. The man with the six-shooter hit him a fierce kick with his boot, and then stooped down and examined him, saying: "O, he is dead as hell." It was so; the darky died that way—in a reclining position.

When we came back near the landing the boat's crew were carrying aboard the two wounded white men, a Mr. Hadnet and another whose name I did not learn.

I now ask the careful consideration of the House to the official statement of Lieutenant-General P. H. Sheridan to the condition of Louisiana. No man can question the truth of his statements, terrible as he describes the condition of the country:

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, January 10, 1875—11.30 p. m.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Since the year 1866, nearly thirty-five hundred persons, a great majority of whom were colored men, have been killed and wounded in this State. In 1868 the official record shows that eighteen hundred and eighty-four were killed and wounded. From 1868 to the present time, no official investigation has been made, and the civil authorities in all but a few cases have been unable to arrest, convict, and punish perpetrators. Consequently, there are no correct records to be consulted for information. There is ample evidence, however, to show that more than twelve hundred persons have been killed and wounded during this time, on account of their political sentiments. Frightful massacres have occurred in the parishes of Bossier, Caddo, Catahoula, Saint Bernard, Saint Landry, Grant, and Orleans. The general character of the massacres in the above-named parishes is so well known that it is unnecessary to describe them. The isolated cases can be best illustrated by the following instances, which I take from a mass of evidence now lying before me of men killed on account of their political principles:

In Natchitoches Parish, the number of isolated cases reported is thirty-three. In the parish of Bienville the number of men killed is thirty. In Red River Parish the isolated cases of men killed is thirty-four. In Winn Parish the number of isolated cases where men were killed is fifteen. In Jackson Parish the number killed is twenty, and in Catahonla Parish the number of isolated cases reported where men were killed is fifty, and most of the country parishes throughout the State will show a corresponding state of affairs. The following statements will illustrate the character and kind of these outrages: On the 30th of August, 1874, in Red River Parish, six State and parish officers, named Twitchell, Divers, Holland, Howell, Edgerton, and Willis, were taken, together with four negroes, under guard, to be carried out of the State, and were deliberately murdered on the 29th of August, 1874. The White League tried, sentenced, and hung two negroes on the 28th of August, 1874. Three negroes were shot and killed at Brownsville, just before the arrival of the United States troops in this parish. Two white-leaguers rode up to a negro-cabin and called for a drink of water. When the old colored man turned to draw it, they shot him in the back and killed him. The courts were all broken up in this district, and the district judge driven out.

In the parish of Caddo, prior to the arrival of the United States troops, all of the officers at Shreveport were compelled to abdicate by the White League, which took possession of the place. Among those obliged to abdicate were Walsh, the mayor; Rapers, the sheriff; Wheaton, clerk of the court; Durant, the recorder, and Ferguson and Renfro, administrators. Two colored men, who had given evidence in regard to frauds committed in the parish, were compelled to flee for their lives, and reached this city last night, having been smuggled through in a cargo of cotton. In the parish of Bossier the White League have attempted to force the abdication of Judge Baker, the United States commissioner and parish judge, together with O'Neal, the sheriff, and Walker, the clerk of the court; and they have compelled the parish and district courts to suspend operations. Judge Baker states that the white-leaguers notified him several times that if he became a candidate on the republican ticket, or if he attempted to organize the republican party, he should not live until election.

They also tried to intimidate him through his family by making the same threats to his wife, and when told by him that he was a United States commissioner, they notified him not to attempt to exercise the functions of his office. In but few of the country parishes can it be truly said that the law is properly enforced, and in some of the parishes the judges have not been able to hold court for the past two years. Human life in this State is held so cheaply that when men are killed on account of political opinions the murderers are regarded rather as heroes than as criminals in the localities where they reside and by the White League and their supporters.

An illustration of the ostracism that prevails in the State may be found in a resolution of a White League club in the parish of De Soto, which states "that they pledge themselves under (no!) circumstances after the coming election to employ, rent land to, or in any other manner give aid, comfort, or credit to any man, white or black, who votes against the nominees of the white-man's party." Safety for individuals who express their opinion in the isolated portions of this State has existed only when that opinion was in favor of the principles and party supported by the Ku-Klux and White-League organizations. Only yesterday Judge Myers, the parish judge of the parish of Natchitoches, called on me upon his arrival in this city, and stated that in order to reach here alive he was obliged to leave his home by stealth, and after nightfall, and make his way to Little Rock, Arkansas, and come to this city by way of Memphis.

He further states that, while his father was lying at the point of death in the same village, he was unable to visit him for fear of assassination, and yet he is a native of the parish, and proscribed for his political sentiments only. It is more than probable that if bad government has existed in this State it is the result of the armed organizations, which have now crystallized into what is called the White League; instead of bad government developing them, they have by their terrorism prevented to a considerable extent the collection of taxes, the holding of courts, the punishment of criminals, and vitiated public sentiment by familiarizing it with the scenes above described. I am now engaged in compiling evidence for a detailed report upon the above subject, but it will be some time before I can obtain all the requisite data to cover the cases that have occurred throughout the State. I will also report in due time upon the same subject in the States of Arkansas and Mississippi.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT UPPER RED RIVER,
Shreveport, Louisiana, December 30, 1874.

SIR: Referring to your telegram of December 17, directing me, in certain events, to be in readiness to suppress violence and let it be understood that I would do it, I have the honor to report that, in view of these instructions, I have been at some pains to investigate the probabilities of violence here, and find the following to be the facts as nearly as I can ascertain them:

The State returning board have officially announced that the candidates for office in this parish on what is known as the radical ticket are duly and lawfully elected; the leaders of the opposing party declare that such is not the fact, and that the persons then declared elected shall not take or hold the offices; this determination appears to be well settled, and so generally expressed and approved by the large majority of the whites, that I have no doubt it is more than an idle threat; this expression in many instances is accompanied by threats of violence and even death to the officers if they attempt to take the offices, and I cannot doubt that such threats are very seriously made; they are only a repetition of what was at all times the open talk of all the leaders before the election. Three of the officers referred to are members of the lower house of the State Legislature, and all three are now in New Orleans. The others are the parish judge, Creswell; the sheriff, Kefner, and several minor officers, including police, jury, justices of the peace, and constables. These are here. There is on the part of most of them such apprehension of danger in assuming their duties that, except the parish judge, I do not think any one of them will attempt or could be induced to take his office. The parish judge is a man of courage and coolness, and I cannot tell whether he will attempt to take his office or not.

Whether any violence which will render military interference necessary shall occur depends upon so many contingencies that I am not prepared to give any opinion except to say that, if these officers attempt to take their office, I have no doubt whatever that it will be necessary to protect them. The three who have gone to New Orleans to take their seats as members of the Legislature beyond doubt could not safely return here now. Outside of the officers named above, there is no one left here to do violence upon. The leading radicals have left. The usual worrying and harassing of the negroes go on with little intermission, but lately no acts of violence to person have come to my knowledge; such acts now are confined to plundering them, with or without some show of legal forms, and driving them from their homes to seek places to live elsewhere. The conflict for the offices, whether conducted by peaceable legal means or by violence, will stop what little legal check now exists upon crime and wrong-doing, and will greatly aggravate the condition of things, which is already serious enough, but I do not apprehend that it will result in extended disorder at present, because there is nothing left to work upon except the commoner orders, and partly because the leading white-leaguers have gone to New Orleans.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEWIS MERRILL,
Major Seventh Cavalry, Commanding District.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, Louisiana.

[Telegram.]

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 4, 1875. (Received 4—11.45 p. m.)

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which are hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that, unless something is done to give protection to the people, all security usually afforded by law will be overriden. Defiance to the laws and the murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

[Telegram dated New Orleans, La., January 6, 1875. Received January 6, 1875.]

General W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

The city is very quiet to-day. Some of the banditti made idle threats last night that they would assassinate me because I dared to tell the truth. I am not afraid, and will not be stopped from informing the Government that there are localities in this department where the very air has been impregnated with assassination for several years.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General Commanding.

The use of the military by the President can be summed up in a few words.

First. Its use has been proper, and can be justified on the ground it was necessary in the reorganization of the States.

Secondly. Its use is fully established by democratic precedent in a large number of instances.

Thirdly. There has never been any complaint of its use when its interference was against the blacks and in favor of the whites. Two of these instances of a late date very fully sustain my statements, one in the case of Brooks against Baxter for the governorship of Arkansas. This case, when it became to be unearthed of its fraud and rascality, is found in favor of Brooks and against Baxter. So clearly does this appear that the committee of this House report unanimously, democrats as well as republicans, that Mr. Brooks has been kept out of his office by the most infamous of practice. On this case the committee state the following:

> Without going more into detail, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that by a fair and honest return and count of the votes actually given at the election Brooks was elected governor, and of right should have been so declared.

The President, unable to get at the facts, which were kept covered up by fraud, and being very desirous to do nothing that could be construed into assumption of power not belonging to him, left the question as much as possible to the Legislature of that State. The acting governor of the "white man's government" bribed the Legislature and by fraud set aside the constitution in which the people had pledged themselves to stand by, and through intimidation and villainy set up a government in violation of all law, placing in power the men who had by these base practices consummated their infamous purposes. These facts being notorious and glaringly true, we would suppose the democratic press of the country and the orators of that party would have loudly clamored in favor of the restoration of Brooks. But they are as silent as the grave; no appeal reaches us from them, as it does in the case of McEnery of Louisiana. No; to favor Brooks would be taking a position on the side of the equality of all people and a demand for the protection of life and property of the entire people of the State of Arkansas.

The other case I have referred to is the interference of the military force at New Orleans with the organization of the Legislature. The military was first invited to interfere, and applauded by the democratic mob in and around the house of representatives of that Legisture, and this applause was echoed through the entire democratic press of the country; but when the commander of the military force determined not to allow the strong arm of this Government to be used in support of fraud and usurpation of power and violation of law, and on the other hand insisted that the law should be maintained and the Legislature organized thereby, instead of by usurpation of power, then that which had been but an hour before patriotic and legal became in the eyes of the murderous White-league Klan, that were in and around that body, illegal and treasonable.

The indignation of these gentlemen would never have been heard had Colonel De Trobriand gone no further with his interference than to support and maintain their usurpation of the control of that branch of the Legislature.

This cry of military interference comes with but little grace from men who have been organizing illegal military forces all over the South, armed and equipped, revolutionary and treasonable in their designs. We have only to refer to mob violence and murders committed by these people with immunity from punishment to have a fair exhibition of the justice, honesty, and fair play manifested by the democratic party in the whole contest in the reorganization of those States.

The remedy for these troubles, after the education and prejudices that have been bred in these people for over a hundred years of the rule of tyranny and slavery, is hard to determine. Experience has taught us what many insisted on at the close of the war, and what I then felt and believed, that you cannot make loyal and law-abiding citizens of men who have committed treason to the Government that has forced them to lay down their arms, but which has neither gained their good-will nor respect by this compulsion. It is worse than useless and even cruel to the loyal men of the South to permit or extend to such men the full power to rule and control the country that their arms have failed to destroy. It is not human nature that men should thus stultify their own conduct and actions. Men will not do so even if they have to confess their wrongs, but will allow their ambition and love of success, their hate of defeat, to so far control their actions as to take all advantages of the Government they have been forced to obey.

There are of course some exceptions to this rule. There are men who in the course of events have become conscientiously convinced they were in error in their opposition to the Government, and have entered into their new relation with zeal and earnestness to recompense the country as far as possible for their former error and crime. Were it practicable now to go back and re-enact the reorganization of the rebellious States, I should certainly insist that the disloyal citizens should have their property and their lives protected. I should as earnestly insist that there should be such provisional government in each of these States as would in all respects give to every citizen, from the highest to the lowest, full and equal protection of his rights under the law, and if need be provide for this protection by ample military force. This form of government should continue until by the common consent of the people of these States the example of obedience and a well-regulated protection should insure and guarantee the continuance of this protection, and give encouragement to labor, immigration, and enterprise.

It was the duty of the General Government to have given complete security, protection, and freedom to every American citizen, and then to have relied on time, northern thrift and enterprise, German economy, and Irish pluck to have combined with southern energy and impulse, to have assimilated the people into one common brotherhood before the law, and to have inculcated and built up a public sentiment that we are one country, one constitution, and have one set of laws for all people. But our vacillating course, our want of nerve and firmness, our disregard of the security of the rights of American citizens has permitted the confederate element to a great extent to consummate in violation of law that which they failed to gain by arms.

Mr. Speaker, we should go back to the great American principles that all men are created and endowed with life, liberty, and the right unmolested to acquire and possess property. From the four corners of the earth we invite all people to make their homes on our broad domain, and pledge them that our flag, the Stars and Stripes, shall give to them and all citizens unqualified protection, thus guaranteeing to every one an even start and a fair chance in the race of life.

Upon these fundamental principles, immortal as eternity, we would soon inaugurate peace and prosperity in all our borders, the South as well as the North. Can we live in a Republic on any other principles and our Government last? Can we violate the fundamental laws of our organization as a government and fail to be punished as a nation? Will not the cancer of wrong eat all the vitals of our body-politic until we have become constitutionally diseased and our institutions die? Is there any other safer principle than right and justice, as God in his wisdom has created these principles, and not as man has compromised them with his prejudices, cruel, in human prejudices? Are we never to learn from our own misfortunes, our blunders? How fresh ought to be the voice of Jefferson as one crying in the wilderness, "when I remember God is just, I tremble for my country," and the eloquent Clay, when he said no human power could induce him to extend the curse of slavery over one foot of soil then free, and the thousand warnings of the old patriots of our land that our country could not live and continue to violate all rules of right and justice and permit tyranny and oppression to stalk abroad in the land.

When shall the memories of that terrible retribution, that bloodiest of wars die out in our minds? Go and ask the soldier's widow on these cold winter days and nights; see her in her cabin or hovel, where the fierce and angry wintry winds shriek and howl through its open and dilapidated walls; she and her little ones hovering around the hearth-stone, no fuel, scantily clothed, no food, and her offspring, the children of him who gave his life a ransom for our national sins, a sacrifice that our country might live. These images of the dead but not forgotten father huddle around their mother's knee and cry in anguish for food, clothing, and warmth, while the recording angels make note of the tears of blood and the heart-pains of that mother as she wrings her hands in mute answer to their cry for life. Go ask her can we dare commit anew the wrongs for which we have been so lately and terribly chastened.

Well do I remember, Mr. Speaker, the bitter denunciations of the southern people toward the North for proposing to interfere with the evil of slavery. While most of them would admit it was an evil, they exclaimed with great indignation, "It is none of the business of the people of the North." "We alone are responsible," said they; "all we ask is for you to let us alone. We will assume all risk and responsibility." And just as well do I remember the crawling, whining, dough-face of the North when he eulogized and lauded the wonderful civilization of our southern brethren. He abused the northern patriot and philanthropist for his just indignation over this "sum of all villainies." He hissed on the blood-hounds to the capture of nature's freemen, then the slave of tyrant man.

I remember also that many thousands of our northern people believed then that slavery was a curse for which we as a nation must pay the penalty, just as they now believe that we must be held responsible for the murders and oppression of the Ku-Klux Klans and White Leagues. They had not then, nor have they now, nerve enough to place their ban upon the evils that are inflicted on the poor people of the South, and demand that justice and right, law and order, shall reign throughout the entire country. They act as if they supposed the God of justice sleepeth, and did not hear the cry of the oppressed and murdered people, and again we hear the old cry saying the people of the North should attend to their own affairs and let the South alone; that it is not the business of the North to interfere in the government of the South; that the North should remember and see to their own failures in government.

Is not history repeating itself in matters yet fresh in the memories of most of our people? And as He who rules the destinies of nations has decreed that the entire people of a country must be held responsible for national wrongs, that law equally holds the particeps criminis responsible for the wrongs of their principals; so we of both sides of the country have meted and again must mete out punishment for all wrongs and oppressions of the citizens of our common country. It is also decreed and foreordained that we as a people have a high and noble mission that we dare not disregard or fail to fulfill in one jot or tittle; that we must establish equal rights, freedom, and self-government for all, and constitutional liberty and republican form of government for the oppressed of every land and nation.

Talk of your Constitution; of the reserved rights of the States. Hurl your charges of tyrannical interference and usurpation. You know now, and you knew years ago, that a terrible wrong covers the whole South as with the pall of death. You must admit that crimes are being perpetrated every day under the eye of the General Government, and in the face of its law and in defiance of its officers and mandates. If we do not assert the right of our Government to protect its people and punish these wrongs, lay down our weak and blind prejudices, and extend to all free and ample protection of law we are in the beginning of a great strife—a war of races; a war of wrongs against right; a war of prejudices against justice, and a war of untold horrors—unknown agonies, compared to which those we have gone through have been but mere child's play. I would remind those who will not listen to the warnings so plainly manifested, and refuse that justice to others that they so earnestly demand for themselves, it does not need a prophet to divine the result of such a strife; for as long as "there's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will," so long will the right prevail and justice triumph, notwithstanding our blind zeal for old, exploded ideas and prejudices. The law that gives to all equal protection injures no one. The very fact that all are equal and the rights of all guaranteed, insures that no one can suffer or be wronged. More than two-thirds of the people of this country are in favor of equal protection, are willing to concede such rights to every one. Shall we as a nation allow a small minority to bring evil, and only evil, on our land? Will we not, on the other hand, go back to first principles, to the fundamental rules of government, and see that exact justice is done to all—that our flag protects every American citizen, at home and abroad, let his color, race, or nationality be what it may?

The supremacy of the Constitution essential to Civil Liberty.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. STEVENSON,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 17, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the resolution to admit P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat as Senator from Louisiana—

Mr. STEVENSON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not often trespass upon the time or tax the patience of the Senate by long speeches. It may have occurred in the past, that I have been silent when I should have spoken. If such fault attaches to me, a generous and confiding constituency will, I am sure, attribute the delinquency to my well-known disposition to listen rather than to speak. I am this morning laboring under severe physical indisposition, and were it not that I feel it to be due to the people of the Commonwealth whom I in part represent, earnestly to protest in their name against the open infraction of the Constitution of the United States which the proposed action will in my judgment effect, I should be silent to-day.

The pending motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is to seat P. B. S. Pinchback as a Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana upon a prima facie right arising upon the regularity of his credentials. This present right is alleged to be prima facie, but the principle which it involves goes far beyond any mere prima facie title to a seat in this Chamber, however important such title may be to the claimant himself or to the State which he seeks to represent. If the motion prevail, it strikes a fatal blow at the very foundation of American self-government. I do not certainly know, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] will be kind enough to inform me, whether this prima facie right of the claimant now insisted upon rests upon the election in 1873 or that in 1875.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has not read the report to inform himself on that subject? The committee reported upon the credentials signed in 1873.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not hear the reply of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I stated that if my friend would read the report of the committee it would show to him that the committee reported Mr. Pinchback to be entitled to a seat in this body because his credentials, signed by the governor of Louisiana, countersigned by the secretary of state, and bearing the great seal of the State, showed that he had been elected Senator in January, 1873, in accordance with the forms prescribed by the act of Congress.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the Senator from Indiana for this information. I had supposed such to be the fact. I am glad now to have it officially announced. I think there have been one or two motions at different times as to the prima facie right of the claimant to a seat in this Chamber. And certainly Pinchback claims to have been twice elected, in 1873 and in 1875, by two separate and distinct Legislatures.

The solution of the pending question reopens in all its length and breadth the sad story of Louisiana's wrongs and Louisiana's sufferings. It involves the validity of the Kellogg government. It demands the judgment of the Senate upon the legality of the Legislature of January, 1873, elected on the Kellogg ticket, and that of January 1875, on the same ticket. But, sir, it involves if possible higher considerations. The President of the United States has announced that he will regard the admission of Pinchback into this Chamber as a direct approval of his action for the last twenty-three months in the use of the Army of the United States in the State of Louisiana with all its lamentable and bloody results. In that aspect, the disposal of this question by the Senate becomes important not alone to Louisiana and her people, but it affects directly the people of every State in the American confederacy.

The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in his recent specious but able speech on Louisiana affairs, said that he regarded the principles underlying that discussion as the most important which the Senate have been called upon to consider since the foundation of the Government. I fully agree with that sentiment. I only lament that so many of his political friends in this Chamber non-concur with him in that opinion. I attribute such non-concurrence to high party excitement, and if the fabric of American representative self-government ever finds a grave, it will be largely attributable to the fact, that party feeling and the strong desire of the dominant party to retain power, blinds them to the flagrant violations of the Constitution, upon the integrity of which, its preservation rests.

It was but the other day, in an informal conversation in the Senate about the order of business, some Senator proposed to lay aside the Louisiana question, of which he said the Senate and the whole country were heartily sick, and take up an appropriation bill. I innocently replied, that while I did not desire to antagonize with any of the appropriation bills, I must be permitted to say, that I regarded the questions involved in Louisiana affairs as transcending in importance any question of mere supplies. Instantly an audible laugh upon the republican side of the Chamber followed my suggestion. At the expense, however, of additional mirth, I to-day stand in this Chamber and upon my responsibility as an American Senator say, both to the Senate and to the country, ten thousand times better let all appropriation bills perish rather than that the archives of this Senate should show a vote of money to the violators of the sovereignty of a single State or of the liberty of its people.

If I know myself, Mr. President, I am no alarmist. I have never surrendered my faith in the success of American constitutional free government. But when I see a State crushed by Federal power; when I see State Legislatures made and unmade by the usurpation of a Federal district judge; when I see a State Legislature invaded by Federal power and five of its members ruthlessly dragged from the legislative hall by United States soldiers; when I hear the daily newspaper in this city the recognized organ, I believe, of the Administration, proclaiming to the Congress, that the republican party is entitled to one hundred and thirty-seven votes in the next Congress if the republican majority in this does its whole duty; when in the fourth quarter of the nineteenth century, in a time of profound peace, I hear it announced that a bill is about to be introduced and attempted to be hurried through both Houses of Congress, under the edict of a party caucus, clothing the President with discretionary power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and thereby investing him with arbitrary power over the liberty and lives of the American people; when resolutions are adopted at a meeting of the colored citizens in this District, invoking Congress to pass the civil-rights bill, lest blood and conflagration may be inaugurated in the South in the event of the failure of such legislation—when I hear and see all these things, followed by an utter indifference of the dominant party, I frankly admit that there is some ground for popular apprehension for the continuance of our free institutions.

The pending motion is a remarkable one. It has no parallel in parliamentary history. I challenge the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] when he comes to close this debate, to cite a solitary instance in the past history of the Senate in which the pending application can find a precedent. None of the former claims to seats in this Chamber are like this.

Nor is this effort to seat Pinchback wanting in novelty. That a claimant should have his credentials to a seat in the Senate and in the House, pending at the same session and for the same Congress, and at the same time, is certainly new in American legislation. But the fact that, without any action upon the credentials of this claimant by either the Senate or by the House, he should have been re-elected to the Senate by another Legislature, wholly distinct from the first, for the same senatorial term, is a still more wonderful and novel feature in the pending procedure.

I hope I shall not be considered personal, or out of taste, if I add that the claimant who is thus thrice honored, is an American citizen of colored descent, a fact which tends strongly to refute the charge that all colored citizens of Louisiana are oppressed and ostracized by their white brethren. I do not think it has happened before in our political history that a white citizen was ever elected for the same term to more than one House of Congress. I repeat that this application is without a parallel. What are the facts? Upon the 15th day of December, 1873, the Senator inaugurated the pending proceeding by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback for a seat in the Senate of the United States for six years commencing on the 4th of March, 1873, being in regular form, he is entitled under the law and in conformity with the usages of the Senate to be sworn in as a member, and that whatever grounds of contest there may be as to his right to a seat should be made thereafter.

A debate ensued, in which the Senator from Indiana said, that he only presented these credentials to assert a prima facie right for the claimant; that he did not propose to go into the absolute question of title; and he gave notice that the resolution now offered by him would be considered on the following day. It was not so considered. Other business intervened. On January 20, 1874, the Senator from Indiana asked leave "to take from the table the resolution for the admission of P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat in this body" with a view of referring said credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, "and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Bear in mind, Senators, that the pending application was a prima facie case, as alleged in the resolution. On the 20th of January, 1874, the Senator from Indiana moved the reference of the claimant's credentials to the consideration of the Committee on Privileges and Elections with a view of sending for persons and papers. Let us see now what the Senator's object was in that reference, and see how far such reference goes toward destroying this alleged prima facie title:

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take from the table the resolution for the admission of P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat in this body; and I will state the purpose for which I desire to have it taken up. It is that I may make this motion: that the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to investigate the circumstances attending the election of said Pinchback to a seat in this body.

I will state to the Senate that since the adjournment of the Senate on last Friday evening I have received information which I think makes it important to the State of Louisiana, and to the Senate and to the country, that an investigation touching the circumstances of this election be made. I ask, therefore, to have this resolution taken up for the purpose of enabling me to make the motion I have stated.

Now here we see a total change of front by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] The Senator, after insisting on a prima facie right of Pinchback, abandons that ground by a motion to refer the credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to investigate certain charges against Pinchback, which if true, the Senator informed us would disqualify Pinchback and vitiate his title.

The motion to refer and to investigate is in direct antagonism with any motion to seat on a prima facie title. Even the Senator from Indiana, after what he said on moving to refer the credentials of Pinchback, would scarcely insist that Pinchback ought to be seated until the investigation proposed by him had been had.

But when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] abandoned the prima facie title of Pinchback, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] came instantly to his relief.

I read from the RECORD a part of the proceedings, 26th July, 1874, in the Senate:

Mr. MORTON. I move, according to notice given last week, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution to admit Mr. Pinchback to his seat on this floor as a Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution introduced by himself in regard to seating Mr. Pinchback as a Senator from the State of Louisiana. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate, and will be read.

Mr. MORTON. Before making the motion——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

Mr. HAMLIN. The resolution is now before the Senate, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I ask the Senator from Indiana to allow me to submit a motion. I will not take up more than a single minute. It is an amendment to the resolution, which I propose to submit.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will state the point of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. When the question of Louisiana was up on a former occasion, my colleague [Mr. MCCREERY] was entitled to the floor. It is now up, and I do not see how he can be deprived of the floor. When the question of Louisiana was last under discussion, I repeat, my colleague was recognized as entitled to the floor on that resolution; it is now before the Senate; and my question of order is that he cannot be deprived of his right, which he has patiently waited for weeks, and to which, under the rules of the Senate, it seems to me he is entitled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. Had the Senate adjourned pending this resolution, the Senator from Kentucky would have been recognized by the Chair as entitled to the floor; but that is not the manner in which the resolution comes before the Senate. It is brought up to-day by the motion of the Senator from Indiana, who has the floor to make the motion and the floor to make his remarks upon the subject.

Mr. HAMLIN. I supposed everybody in the Senate was disposed to concede to the Senator from Kentucky the floor to-day. I understood him to have it. A mere suggestion from the Senator from Indiana, if he proposes to make it before the Senator from Kentucky proceeds with his speech, I suppose will not be disagreeable to the Senator himself. I want to offer an amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Maine for that purpose?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. I send up the amendment, and I will state in a word the reason for my amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the whole thing read, the resolution and amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 20th of January is as follows:

"Resolved, That the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to investigate the circumstances attending the election of said Pinchback to a seat in this body."

The amendment now submitted by Mr. HAMLIN is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following:

"That P. B. S. Pinchback be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Louisiana upon taking the proper oath, and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon."

Thus it appears that the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Indiana absolutely changed places; the Senator from Indiana abandoned his original resolution to seat Pinchback upon his prima facie title, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] instantly took it up. I do not think that will be denied. The Senator from Indiana opposed the amendment of the Senator from Maine, and thereby directly opposed the seating of Pinchback upon his prima facie credentials. Why? I will allow the Senator to respond and I give him the benefit of his own words. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said:

Now, Mr. President, within a few days, and since that time, information has come to me of a character that I was not at liberty to overlook or to pass by, in effect charging Mr. Pinchback with improper conduct in connection with his election; which charges, if true, would, in my opinion render it improper for him to have a seat upon this floor. Having due regard to my honor as a Senator, as the chairman of the committee charged with such investigations, and my duty to the Senate, I did not feel at liberty to withhold that information from the Senate and to proceed with the original resolution asking Mr. Pinckback to be seated. To have withheld that information from the Senate would have been an assumption upon my part of the right to determine the question that Mr. Pinchback should first be seated and the investigation made afterward. I thought I had no right myself to determine that question, and that it was my duty to bring it before the Senate and devolve upon the Senate the responsibility in regard to that question as well as in regard to others, whether the Senate would seat Mr. Pinchback first and investigate him afterward, or would first investigate him and determine whether he was entitled to be seated afterward. I knew of no way of placing myself and of getting that question properly before the Senate than by making the motion which I now send to the Chair:

"Resolved, That the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinckback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to inquire into the conduct of said Pinchback in connection with said election."

What election? That in 1873. Has that investigation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections into the validity of claimant's title been made? If so, where is the report? Have the charges against the claimant which the honorable Senator from Indiana told the Senate "due regard to his honor as a Senator, as chairman of the committee charged with such investigations, and his duty to the Senate" would not allow him to withhold, been investigated? If so, what is the result? Have the charges been disproved?

The Senator from Indiana would scarcely have abandoned the prima facie title of the claimant embraced in his first resolution, and demanded an investigation by a standing committee of which he was chairman, unless there was some ground to sustain the charges against the claimant. When we recall the statement of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that the charges against the claimant were of so serious a nature as to deprive Pinchback of a seat in this body, we are still more surprised that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] should now attempt to seat him until the truth or falsity of those charges are established or disproved.

But the pending motion involves higher considerations.

Was there a valid government in Louisiana when the election of Pinchback took place? Was the Legislature which elected him the legal Legislature, elected by the people of Louisiana under the constitution and laws of that State? Or was it a spurious body, conceived in fraud and born of usurpation? Was Kellogg, who certified the credentials at the time of certifying, the legally elected governor of Louisiana?

These are grave questions, and their right solution involves other States besides Louisiana. Until they are answered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] should not succeed in seating the claimant upon any title, prima facie or otherwise.

The Senator from Indiana insists that he has precedents in full support of the prima facie title of the claimant. I utterly deny it. I insist, further, that his motion to refer and investigate, rebuts all prima facie presumption of title on the regularity of the credentials. I know the power and ability of the Senator. I know the disadvantage under which I labor when I enter the lists with him on any question of law or fact. I know his ingenuity and skill in turning authorities in support of any proposition which he advocates. Still, I insist that the precedents cited by him differ wholly from this application, and are not available as authority in support of it.

He cites the case of Goldthwaite. That involved no question of the validity either of the Legislature which elected him, or the goveror who authenticated his credentials. The sole question in that case was, whether certain members of the Alabama Legislature were not disqualified from service by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. It was held that the Senate had no right to inquire into the qualifications of the members of a State Legislature. But even by the Senator's own vote, GOLDTHWAITE was not seated for several months after the presentation of his credentials. Why, if the Senator's doctrine be true as to a prima facie case, was he not seated at once? It is true, that the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] then a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom GOLDTHWAITE'S credentials were referred, in supporting the prima facie title of GOLDTHWAITE did say, that any Senator presenting credentials from a Legislature, competent to elect, would be entitled prima facie to take his seat in the Senate. I subscribe to that doctrine in all its length and breadth. No Senator that I know of doubts it. It is true on principle and fully sustained by precedent. But it has no application to this case, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] begs the question when he attempts to make it pertinent to the present issue. Why? For the plain reason that before the credentials of Pinchback had been offered, the Committee on Privileges and Elections had, in an elaborate report, declared that there was no valid subsisting government in Louisiana; that Kellogg had not been elected governor, that the legislature which elected Pinchback was not the body elected by the people as the Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

The next case cited by the Senator from Indiana was the case of Potter vs. Robbins, from Rhode Island, in 1834. That case turned upon the legality of a statute of Rhode Island by which certain members of the Rhode Island Legislature held over beyond the term for which they had been elected, and by whom Robbins had been elected. Robbins received his credentials from the governor of Rhode Island. Upon presenting them in due form he was allowed to take his seat on his prima facie right, while an investigation followed. But in the pending case, an investigation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections exhibited the invalidity of Pinchback's election before this motion was made. Nor has the case of Shields, also cited by the Senator from Indiana, any bearing upon this case. There the Legislature was a valid one; there the governor who certified the credentials had been legally elected. Both these elements are wanting here.

The only case which seems to bear any analogy whatever to that of Pinchback, is that of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER.] But even there the governor that certified Spencer's credentials was admitted to be the legally elected governor of Alabama.

By all parliamentary procedure, the refusal of the Senate to admit John Ray on his credentials, which were in all respects as regular as those of Pinchback, elected at the same time and by the same Legislature, certified to by the same identical William Pitt Kellogg as governor of Louisiana, should estop the Senator from Indiana in urging upon the Senate the pending motion.

How can that Senator in view of his past action touching Ray's case justify the inconsistency of his present action? Ray was elected to fill Kellogg's vacancy, by the same Legislature and at the same time, that Pinchback was elected as Kellogg's successor for the full term of six years commencing on the 4th of March, 1873. If Pinchback is entitled to be seated on his prima facie right, why did not the Senator from Indiana insist upon seating Ray? Yet that Senator himself moved, I believe, to refer the credentials of Ray, and united with the committee in their report that Ray was not entitled to his seat. The two cases stand in every respect on the same footing; the title of both is res adjudicata.

If a committee of privileges and elections of the Senate, composed of its most able and distinguished men, with no democrat upon it, and with but one dissenting voice, after a laborious investigation and an examination of many witnesses, reached the conclusion, that there was no valid government in Louisiana, no governor legally elected by the people, no legal Legislature, and that John Ray was not entitled to his seat, how can it be said that Pinchback was elected? The Legislature which elected one elected the other. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] would endeavor to persuade us that as Pinchback's credentials were not before the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the time of this report, he is not to be bound by the finding against Ray! But such a proposition is more specious than solid. It has neither principle nor authority for its support. The finding of the fact that there was no government, no legal Legislature, no governor, by any tribunal having jurisdiction to inquire into the fact, like a judgment in admiralty, binds everybody. Legislative bodies in their ascertaining conclusions of fact for legislative purposes are not bound by the strict rules of evidence in tribunals purely judicial. The former proceed at once to legislate upon papers, documents, oral testimony of witnesses brought before them to ascertain and determine the truth of any alleged fact set forth in petitions, remonstrances, memorials, alleged grievances, and thus ascertain and report the facts upon the subject-matter committed to their consideration.

The facts ascertained by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, with the testimony on which their report with its conclusions of law and fact rest, under an investigation ordered by the Senate, conducted by its own members, affecting the title to a seat in the body, constitutes evidence binding not only in that case but in all cases and for all legitimate purposes. It is therefore idle to say, that Pinchback, claiming his election by the very Legislature and his credentials by the very governor, the validity of whose election this committee was charged to inquire into, is not bound by that report, unless disproved or overthrown.

That the Senate may decide upon the validity of any Legislature electing a Senator, or upon the rightful tenure of the governor certifying the credentials of such Senator, has long since been determined by the usage of the Senate. The Constitution of the United States constitutes the Senate the sole judge of the elections and qualifications and returns of its members. It was therefore pertinent for the Committee of Privileges and Elections in investigating the title of John Ray to a seat in the Senate to inquire into the validity of the Legislature which elected him, and also into the election of Kellogg, who certified his credentials.

It is a somewhat significant fact, that during this entire discussion, I have heard no Senator claim, that Kellogg was legally elected governor by the vote of the people in 1872. His recognition by the President of the United States is wholly a different thing.

I know that the honorable Senator from Indiana says, that this recognition by the President of Kellogg as governor of Louisiana is binding upon the Senate. Still no Senator has attempted to show that Kellogg was legally and fairly elected governor of Louisiana.

If we look to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections submitted by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] on 20th February, 1873, we shall find that on the face of the official returns of the election in 1871 that McEnery and the Legislature running on his ticket were elected.

It is true that a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections (Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Hill dissenting) report that in their opinion the frauds committed in that election were so great as to vitiate and annul it, and hence they recommend a new election. But none of that committee, not even the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] himself, claimed in that report that Kellogg was elected governor, or that there was a valid State government in Louisiana. The committee were unanimous on that point, and yet Kellogg's election was essential to make valid the credentials of Pinchback.

The committee say:

> If the Senate should be inclined not to go behind the official returns of the election, then the McEnery government and legislature must be recognized as the lawful government of the State, and McMillen, if regularly elected by that Legislature, should be seated in the Senate in place of Kellogg. But your committee believe that this would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of that State.
> Second. If the Senate shall concur with us in the opinion that the frauds committed in the election are sufficient to annul it, then it will be necessary for the Senate to consider whether Congress has the power to order a re-election.

By the official returns of the election in 1872 the fusion ticket, headed by McEnery for governor, received an average majority of ten thousand, and a large majority of the persons elected to the Legislature were of the same party.

But for the illegal, unwarranted, and unjustifiable interference of Federal power, as I shall hereafter show, the McEnery State government and the McEnery legislature would have been peacefully inaugurated. Suppose there were frauds in that election, by what constitutional authority did the Federal Government intervene and crush the suffrage of a free people under the iron heel of arbitrary power? How much oppression, how much sorrow, how much illegal and unconstitutional interference by the Federal Government with a sovereign State would have been avoided, if the President would have turned a deaf ear to the partisan appeals of the usurper Kellogg, and have the permitted State government in Louisiana, elected by the people, to have been inaugurated? There were frauds in all probability committed in some of the parishes by the McEnery party. I will assume that to be true; but casting out all the different parishes where Kellogg charged that frauds were committed, and still McEnery was elected. Allow me to read in support of this assertion a few sentences from the views of Hon. Lyman Trumbull, one of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in the report on Louisiana affairs. He says:

> The State of Louisiana is divided into fifty-six parishes, from only about twenty of which, containing less than one-third of the population of the State, frauds were even reported, and these reports were not supported by the direct testimony of a single witness before the committee, unless proof that the places of registering and of voting were established at inconvenient places in two or three parishes should be regarded as evidence of fraud. The only evidence to sustain the charges of fraud made by the republicans were the opinions of witnesses who took an active part in the election on the republican side and were disappointed at the result, or ex parte affidavits, the statement of the supervisors of election appointed under the act of Congress, letters and verbal statements which were laid before and made to the Lynch returning board, and upon which the committee have already reported, "that the Lynch returning board, with the sort of evidence that was before them, had no power under the law of the State to investigate these charges of fraud and injury or act on their convictions of wrongs that had been suffered."

Grant, if you please, that fraud was practiced in some of the parishes; admit that irregularities existed in others, still in the absence of any legitimate evidence to establish these frauds, or of any sort of complaint even against the fairness of the election in more than two-thirds of the State, it cannot be said that McEnery was not elected by a decided majority of the people; still less, that there was the slighest pretext for military interference by the Federal Government with the election returns of Louisiana. Upon that point there was no doubt. The whole committee was a unit and no Senator was more decided in his views than the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

But, Mr. President, if there were alleged frauds practiced by the McEnery party, what shall we say of the frauds of Kellogg and his returning Lynch board in their bold and unblushing attempt to inaugurate Kellogg and his legislature; to impeach Warmoth; declare Pinchback elected; and then through his appeals for Federal military aid successfully put Louisiana completely under the heel of judicial and military usurpation?

I am no apologist for Warmoth, nor shall I go into the controversy of the two returning boards, known as the Warmoth-Wharton board and the Lynch returning board, except to say, that I believe the committee were agreed that the Warmoth-Wharton board was the legitimate and rightful board to canvass the official returns of the election; that it proceeded to do so, but was illegally restrained by a United States district judge from completing the count of said vote; that by an election law approved November 20, 1872, all previous returning boards were abolished; that the De Feriet-Wiltz board was authorized under that act to complete the canvass commenced by the Wharton board; that the De Feriet board did canvass the official returns; that the result was duly proclaimed by the governor, December 4, 1872; that Herron ceased to be secretary of state, when Wharton was appointed and took possession of the office; that the Lynch returning board never had the authority to examine the returns, and no returns were ever made to said board; that neither Kellogg, nor any of the persons returned as elected to State offices by the Lynch board were elected according to the official returns; that neither the Pinchback, nor the Kellogg State government could have been set up, nor the persons returned by the Lynch board as elected to the Legislature have assembled and organized as a Legislature, but for the unauthorized and usurped authority exercised by Judge Durell enforced and supported by United States troops. Never before in the history of any government professing to be free, have such unblushing frauds as those committed by the Lynch board in support of an alleged election of Kellogg, and his illegal legislature, ever stained its pages. Its frauds are only exceeded by its usurpations. In this assertion I beg the Senate to believe I speak from no democratic stand-point. No, sir; no! My statement rests on the authority of the ablest and most prominent republicans in this Chamber. I refer to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and will be obliged to the Secretary to read the paragraphs in the report which I now send up to him.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

But what did this board do? They resolved themselves into a general committee of investigation. They had no authority as a canvassing board to inquire as to the vote at any of the polling places, because there was no accompanying statement from the commissioner that there had been fraud, or riot which had disturbed the election. They had no jurisdiction of that kind; they had no returns before them to canvass. What did they do? They resolved that they would go away from the returns back to the fact and ascertain how this election resulted. They went on, and, as this testimony shows—and after a brief statement of it I shall have the testimony read, so that I may not misstate it at all—they went on in some cases and obtained from the United States officers the duplicate statements which they kept under the act of Congress. The State canvassers had no more authority to take them than they had to take an affidavit signed by a private person. They took those where they could. Where they could not get them, they took newspaper reports of what the result was at different polls. Where they could not get those they resorted to forged affidavits; and one pleasant little gentleman swears, with a smiling face, that he himself forged twelve hundred affidavits in one day and delivered them to Mr. Bovee, sitting in the board, and Bovee said he was "a hell of a fellow," and asked if he could not get more of the same kind; and he said he could get three or four hundred more of the same kind by nine o'clock the next morning, if necessary. [Laughter.] Then, not satisfied with the duplicate returns, not satisfied with the newspaper accounts, not satisfied with forged affidavits, and after all these valuable means of information failed, the board themselves swear that they made an estimate based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the country as to what the vote ought to have been if it had been fair, and counted it accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And so estimated it?

Mr. CARPENTER. And so estimated it in one parish, giving Mr. Kellogg so many votes, and so on. Now, to illustrate, take the parish of Bossier. There was no statement of riot to give any jurisdiction to inquire into the fact. If any such statement had existed, all that the board could do was either to count or reject the return. They were first to ascertain whether there was any riot, and then to inquire whether it materially affected the result. If it did not amount to much, then they were to count the returns just as they did all the others. If they thought it did materially affect the result, then they were to reject it altogether, and canvass the the rest. They must either count it as it came or reject it entirely. They were to ascertain, on the question of fact, whether the result had been materially affected by the riot. If it had been, they were to reject it altogether and count nothing from that poll; if it had not materially affected the result, although there had been a riot or had been bribery, they were to count it. In other words, it was a general equitable jurisdiction, to do, as they say up in New England, about what is right.

What think you, Senators, of that as a egal election? There was not a democrat upon that committee nor any dissent as to the frauds therein set out. What think you, republican Senators, of the election of a governor and Legislature elected by such means and subsequently installed and supported by arbitrary military power?

Listen to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] the republican President pro tempore of the Senate, as he initiates us into the details of the mysteries by which Kellogg was made governor of Louisiana, and the Legislature which elected Pinchback, was declared to be elected. He says:

Another witness, Mr. Jaques, appeared before the committee, and at first I was strongly impressed with the belief that he was lying, that his whole story was made up, and I went for him with a pretty thorough cross-examination, followed him through several pages, and finally became thoroughly convinced that the man was telling the truth. He swore that he had forged twelve hundred affidavits; he said he took the names from an old worn-out poll-list, that a great many of them were dead, and a great many probably never did live. He made up the affidavits without seeing the men—hundreds of them. They were certified as sworn to in blank by a judge before they were filled; and the proceeding, as he testifies to it, is one of the richest that I know of in the history of politics. His testimony—I will not stop to read it—is found on pages 520, 521, 522, and 523, and pages 526, 527, 528, and 530, and fully sustains all that I say.

The affidavits were printed, and they were delivered to this fellow to be manufactured, and with the jurat of the judge attached, certifying that ——— ——— had sworn to the affidavit. When Mr. Jaques took the affidavits, filled them up, signed names to them, then delivered twelve hundred of them at one time to Mr. Bovee, in the open session of the board, the testimony leaving no doubt that the board knew that they were forged affidavits; and, indeed, he says that Bovee joked him afterward for days by asking if they had got through voting up at Plaquemines Parish.

How monstrous! How incredible! What a shocking commentary on the purity and freedom of elections!

With such official testimony as to the colossal frauds by which both Kellogg and his legislature were elected, with the report of MORTON, CARPENTER, ANTHONY, LOGAN, Trumbull, and Hill as to the usurpation and military power by which that governor and Legislature were installed, has the Senate so far fallen from its high estate that it will even consent to sanctify such infamy by seating in this Chamber one born of so unholy and unhallowed a combination? But it is said, that the supreme court of Louisiana has decided in favor of the Louisiana Legislature, and that their ruling is conclusive. Conclusive upon whom? Surely not upon this body. The Senate of the United States and not the supreme court of Louisiana is the tribunal clothed by the Constitution of the United States with the exclusive power to decide upon the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members. The Senate will never surrender this trust, especially to a bastard judicial tribunal which was created in part by Pinchback, and like him and Kellogg, was born of force and fraud, and lives by the bayonets of unauthorized, unlicensed power.

The Senate of the United States has not yet reached that point, I trust, in the downward path of degradation and decay! But the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] after declaring as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections "that the conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended, that he grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and exercised powers to which he could lay no claim, gravely tells us, that the President has recognized both Kellogg and the Kellogg legislature, and therefore Pinchback should be admitted." I have already exposed the fallacy of that position! No recognition of Kellogg as governor by the President can be binding on the Senate in its exclusive constitutional right to judge of the election returns and of certifications of its members. But under what circumstances was this recognition made? The answer to that question demands a review of the conduct of the President and some of his Cabinet in connection with Louisiana usurpations and outrages which I would had been spared me. The occasion however demands freedom and truth. If we desire to preserve liberty, let no violation of the Constitution be excused. Senators say, that the President was sincere, although erroneous. So was Paul in his bloody mission to Damascus. The Lord opened miraculously his eyes to error. I would that some higher than human power would open the President's eyes to the usurpation, wrong, and oppression under which the State of Louisiana is now being enslaved.

It is difficult to realize, after such a report as that of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, (after an investigation of six weeks, with an array of witnesses unsurpassed in parliamentary usage,) that there was no valid government in Louisiana, how the President could have been induced by the falsehood and misrepresentation of selfish party marplots to recognize the Kellogg government. How much better had it been, if the President had in the outset frowned down all efforts at Federal interference, when partisan leaders, defeated by the people, sought his aid? If there had been frauds on either or both sides, how much better it would have been for the President to have allowed the State of Louisiana, under its own constitution and laws, to seek and apply the remedy? Surely the President is aware that the Constitution does not constitute him the censor to correct frauds in State elections or confer upon him any power to interfere with a State in its local self-government. It is true that the Constitution declares that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

But surely the President cannot believe that this great power of the Constitution was to be used by him to quell election disorders or pass upon election returns. It is a vast power, guarded as it is; it is a power of great delicacy, to be used for the highest and most solemn occasions.

Why should the President not have promptly declined all interference? He knew the shocking disclosures made by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections. He knew that the official returns in the election in 1872 showed the election of McEnery by 10,000 majority, and a majority of the McEnery legislature. Why not have allowed the alleged frauds to have been investigated through State agencies? The President well knew that the committee reported no valid government in Louisiana, no valid Legislature; and that a majority of said committee, recommended a new election, while a minority recommended the recognition of the McEnery government and the McEnery legislature.

The President should have promptly withdrawn his troops. Peace would have soon followed. But the partisans who had committed the frauds by which Kellogg and his legislature were to be declared elected, determined to overthrow the legitimate State government and inaugurate a bogus government by revolutionary means. Warmoth was to be impeached, Pinchback succeed him as governor; then the Kellogg government was to be inaugurated, all of which was to be accomplished by Federal power and Federal soldiers. That a plot having that object was agreed upon in New Orleans no one can doubt.

Let us trace its origin, its object, and its triumph. This revolutionary drama opens by the following dispatch from Washington to the United States marshal at New Orleans:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
December 3, 1872.

S. P. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Why that dispatch? At whose instance was it sent? There had been no resistance to any process of the United States courts nor was there any threatened. Governor Warmoth had called the Legislature to assemble on the 9th of December, and this remarkable dispatch is dated the 3d December, 1872.

R. H. Jackson, a captain of the First Artillery United States Army, arrives in New Orleans on the night of the 5th of December with two batteries of his regiment and eighty-six men. By whose order were they sent, and for what purpose? We shall soon see.

Upon the night of Jackson's arrival, between nine and eleven o'clock, Judge Durell, a United States judge, at his private lodgings, issued his order directing the United States marshal forthwith to take possession of the State-house of Louisiana, to hold the same until the further order of the court, and prevent all unlawful assemblage of persons therein, having reference to the persons returned as members-elect to the Legislature according to the official returns. He enjoined the counting of the votes by the legal returning board. A Federal judge by a void process seizing a State-house with intent to subvert a State government, uphold by United States soldiers at the instance of the Attorney-General of the United States!!

How was Durell's order executed? I read from the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Captain Jackson testifies that he took possession of the State-house at about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, with instructions to take and hold it under the direction of the United States marshal and to act in obedience to his orders. He further testified that he was not stationed in the State-house to prevent riots, but to hold the building, and that if a riot had occurred in front of the building he would not have interfered.

Listen, Senators, to that! Durell ordered him to stay within the State-house, no matter what tumult, no matter what insurrection, no matter what force displayed itself outside. Jackson says, "I should not under my orders have interfered."

He posted two soldiers at the entrance door, who guarded it with crossed bayonets, and suffered no one to enter the building except by permission of the United States marshal, one of whose deputies was at all times present. These troops continued to occupy the State-house for more than six weeks, until January 21, and it is manifest, from the whole testimony, that they were not there to preserve the peace, but to carry out the illegal orders of Judge Durell, and prevent the legally elected members of the Legislature from assembling and organizing.

These troops continued to occupy the State-house for more than six weeks until the 21st of January, 1872, and their only use was to execute the void judicial order of Durell and thereby prevent the assembling and organization of the Legislature of Louisiana. This extraordinary action of Durell constituted a part of the plot to subvert the government agreed upon and subsequently consummated. I do not asy the President knew that the Attorney-General sent the telegram to Packard. Still less will I charge, that the Attorney-General knew when this telegram to Packard was sent of the existence of the plot to subvert the legal government of Louisiana, and of the part that Durell and the United States troops under his order were to play in it; but I will say, that the plot had been agreed upon and the Senate of the United States in addition to what the President has done is called upon to-day to sanction the fruits of that usurpation by seating Pinchback. The Senator from Louisiana smiles. So did Nero when Rome was burning. I never knew a guilty criminal when the truth was brought home to him that did not wince.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the Senator will allow me an explanation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. I smiled at the Senator's ignorance.

Mr. STEVENSON. Indeed?

Mr. WEST. On the 16th of November, 1872, the governor of the State of Louisiana had disobeyed an order of that Federal court a fortnight before, and that was the reason why the Attorney-General sent that dispatch. The Senator does not seem to know it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I take issue on the facts with the Senator. I appeal from his statement to the report signed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator stands contradicted by that report. "The dispatch of the Attorney-General, so far as the evidence shows, was not responsive to any call for troops," says Lyman Trumbull, a member of that committee. So if I am in error, I have good official authority for my alleged ignorance.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator to do this: if it is a question of record let him appeal to the record; but do not let him accuse me of standing here defending criminals.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not say you defended criminals.

Mr. WEST. You said I smiled like any man defending criminals.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now say to the Senator what I did not say before, if he defends Durell, Pinchback & Co. he does defend criminals, and I appeal to the American Senate for the truth of my assertion. The gentleman cannot take any issue with me that I am not willing to meet him on; and when he says I am ignorant, I reply that I have the authority of Hon. Lyman Trumbull, the peer of any Senator in this Chamber, in a report to the Senate, uncontradicted by any testimony so far as I know, that the dispatch of the Attorney-General to Packard quoted by me, so far as the evidence before the committee showed, was not responsive to any call for troops; and with that issue of fact between the Senator and the committee I cease this little by-play.

Let me continue the recital. On the 6th day of December, 1872, President Grant received the following dispatch from his brother-in-law, Casey:

NEW ORLEANS, December 6, 1872.

President GRANT:

Marshal Packard took possession of State-house this morning at an early hour with military posse, in obedience to a mandate of circuit court, to prevent illegal assemblage of persons under guise of authority of Warmoth's returning board in violation of injunction of circuit court. Decree of court just rendered declares Warmoth's returning board illegal and orders the returns of the election to be forthwith placed before the legal board. This board will probably soon declare the result of the election of officers of State and Legislature, which will meet in State-house with protection of court.

What think you of that, Senators? A State-house in the capital of a sovereign State and in the military possession of a Federal marshal, and a Legislature elected by the people excluded by Federal soldiers, under a void order of a United States judge, from assembling and organizing for legislative business. Casey's dispatch continues

The decree was sweeping in its provisions, and if enforced will save—

What, do you suppose? The State? No. The public peace? No. The dignity of the United States? No. What is it that Federal interference is going to save?—

Will save the republican majority in Louisiana, a republican Legislature, and a republican State government, and check Warmoth in his usurpation.

What a spectacle! What a blot upon free government! Think of it! A year before the centennial celebration of American liberty, of constitutional free government, a State government set up for party purposes under the usurpation of a district United States judge, and that usurpation supported by the Army of the United States!

The President of the United States is unblushingly asked to uphold the usurpation for party purposes, or, in the words of Casey's telegram, to save the republican majority and give Louisiana a republican Legislature, a State government, and check Warmoth in his usurpation!

How times change and how we change with them? I remember that the first speech the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] made in this body was to eulogize Warmoth as a pure, wise statesman of the highest integrity; and now he is to be impeached by the revolutionists, Durell, Packard, Casey & Co., in order that Pinchback, the lieutenant-governor, may take Warmoth's place, and thus aid in the plot of inaugurating Kellogg and his government on the ruin of that elected by the people.

Mr. WEST. How about Greeley?

Mr. STEVENSON. Greeley? Well, Mr. President, I believe Mr. Greeley was a conscientious, upright man—always superior to Warmoth or to Kellogg. I differed with him politically all my life. I supported him cordially as a liberal republican against an extremist of the same school, and the present condition of my country proves that I did right. I voted for Mr. Greeley for the good of my country. I never permit party to interfere if the peace of my country can be saved by voting even for a republican, but he must be a liberal. [Laughter.] In voting for Mr. Greeley I practiced the doctrine which I urge on republican Senators to illustrate in their action to-day—never to permit mere party to blind their eyes when common dangers require party to be hushed. I believe that had Mr. Greeley been elected he would have stood by the Constitution of his country and restored peace throughout the country. I hope the Senator is answered!

But to return to the plot of subverting the legal government of Louisiana inaugurated by Durell, and the appliances and means of the usurpers to induce the President to intervene.

On 6th December, 1872, Marshal Packard telegraphs the Attorney-General as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 6, 1872.

Attorney-General WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.:

Returning board provided by election of 1870, under which the election was held and which United States court sustains, promulgated in official journal this morning result of election of Legislature. House stands seventy-seven republicans, thirty-two democrats; senate twenty-eight republicans, eight democrats. Board counted ballots attached to affidavits of colored persons wrongfully prevented from voting filed with chief supervisor.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

How rapidly the consummated subversion of Louisiana progresses! The President and Attorney-General seem both to have been kept advised of the actings and doings of the returning board in creating a manufactured Legislature in utter defiance of law and in shameless contempt of all election returns.

The State-house was taken possession of by troops on the 6th of December under Durell's order; no one is allowed to enter unless by Durell's order. On the same day, this illegal returning board of Lynch upon forged and false returns, proclaims the composition of the Legislature, and no one except those designated by this fraudulent board ever pass muster—Durell's sic volo, sic jubeo, governs!

Upon the 9th of December, the day on which the McEnery legislature was to have assembled under Warmoth's proclamation, S. B. Packard telegraphs the Attorney-General as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.:

Returning board has officially promulgated in official journal this morning the result of the election for State officers. Kellogg's majority 18,861.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

Another step in this drama of violence. The Lynch board, which never had a return before it, having selected a Legislature, now announces Kellogg's election and fancifully specifies his majority.

This man Lynch was called before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections and is interrogated as to the modus operandi of his board in reaching the results of the Kellogg election. He said:

We took all the evidence before us and our knowledge of the parishes and their political complexion, and we then decided.

The witness is asked by Senator CARPENTER whether the estimate was made upon what the board thought the returns ought to have been. He replies:

Yes, sir. That was just the fact, and I think on the whole we were pretty correct.

Durell's order is the only standard of the Lynch board in giving certificates of election to any members of their constructed Legislature!

When did American history ever before exhibit so infamous a procedure? A usurping board, backed by the Army of United States, proclaiming a governor of a State without returns and upon guess! But the plot thickens; telegram follows telegram in quick succession. Hear Packard:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General:

Governor Warmoth impeached by a vote of 58 to 6. Warmoth's legislature returned by his board has pretense of a session.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

How could those elected to the Louisiana Legislature by the people enter the State-house when the crossed bayonets of Captain Jackson's soldiers defied entrance?

The impeachment of Warmoth is thus announced by United States Marshal Packard:

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General:

Senate by vote of 17 to 5 have resolved into high court of impeachment. Senator Harris elected president of senate, Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback being now governor.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

On the same day another bulletin announces that Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback, the individual whose claim to a seat in the Senate we are discussing, has qualified as governor:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.:

Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback qualified and took possession of the governor's office to-night. Senate organized as high court of impeachment, Chief Justice Ludeling presiding, and adjourned to meet Monday next. It is believed that all the democratic members of the General Assembly will qualify and take seats to-morrow.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

Within six days from the 3d of December, the day on which the memorable telegram of the Attorney-General to Packard, directing him where to find troops to enforce judicial orders, to the 9th of December, what a revolution was accomplished by violence, fraud, and judicial usurpation?

A free Commonwealth subverted by a United States circuit judge; a Legislature made and unmade by him; a governor impeached; a lieutenant-governor installed by violence! All accomplished, and every step in the revolution daily communicated to the Attorney-General by his Fides Achates, Packard!

What next? The new legislature, conceived and brought forth under the wand of Durell, backed by military power, pass resolutions asking for protection from the President of the United States under the guarantee clause of the Constitution! A free Commonwealth manacled by force! A Legislature and governor displaced by the void order of a United States judge; that order enforced by United States soldiers under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States. A new Legislature ordained by the usurping judge through a fraudulent and illegal returning board, and in violation of every constitutional, legal right of the people of Louisiana, and the revolutionary body thus created, calling on the President of the United States for protection!

Durell's newly created governor, Pinchback, calls for recognition:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

President GRANT:

Having taken the oath of office and being in possession of the gubernatorial office, it devolves upon me to urge the necessity of a favorable consideration of the request of the General Assembly, as conveyed in the concurrent resolutions of this day, telegraphed to you, requesting the protection of the United States Government. Be pleased to send the necessary orders to General Emory. This seems to be a necessary measure of protection, although all is quiet here.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor of Louisiana.

A necessary measure of protection. How? Why? Had not the rightful government of Louisiana been already subverted by Federal power? Where was Jackson with his two batteries and eighty-six men? Was not the whole of the United States military force, by which Durell had accomplished his unhallowed purposes, still at his command? Why, then, this call in view of the transactions of the past few days?

He repeats the telegram. Hear him:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch. May I suggest that the commanding general be authorized to furnish troops upon my requisition upon him for the protection of the Legislature and the gubernatorial office? The moral effect would be great, and in my judgment tend greatly to allay any trouble likely to grow out of the recent inflammatory proclamation of Warmoth. I beg you to believe I will act in all things with discretion.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor.

But the Attorney-General does not respond, and Casey, the brother-in-law of the President, begs for accelerated executive action. Casey telegraphs; hear him:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

President GRANT:

Parties interested in the success of the democratic party, particularly the New Orleans Times, are making desperate efforts to array the people against us. Old citizens are dragooned into an opposition they do not feel, and pressure is hourly growing; our members are poor and our adversaries rich, and offers are made that are difficult for them to withstand. There is danger that they will break our quorum. The delay in placing troops at disposal of Governor Pinchback in accord with joint resolutions of Monday is disheartening to our friends and cheering our enemies. If requisition of Legislature is complied with all difficulty will be dissipated, the party saved, and everything go on smoothly. If this is done the tide will be turned at once in our favor. The real underlying sentiment is with us, if it can be encouraged. Governor Pinchback acting with great discretion as is the Legislature and they will so continue.

JAMES F. CASEY,
Collector.

The collector is more outspoken than Marshal Packard in the objects and purposes of this revolution. Troops, more troops than Captain Jackson's eighty-six men and two batteries, are necessary to sustain the republican plotters in their party schemes and party successes.

What would Washington or any former President of the United States have thought of a proposal to him, to send troops into a sovereign State, to overcome and overawe its people for the supremacy of political power? How long would a public officer have been tolerated by former Presidents after such a telegram? And yet Casey is retained, and continues to hold his office. Pinchback asks for troops to sustain his usurpation. Casey urges it for the success of the party.

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

President GRANT:

Democratic members of Legislature taking their seats. Most, if not all, will do so in next few days. Important that you immediately recognize Governor Pinchback's legislature in some manner, either by instructing General Emory to comply with the requistion of Governor Pinchback under joint resolution of Legislature of Monday or otherwise. This would quiet matters much. I earnestly urge this and ask a reply.

JAMES F. CASEY.

Casey repeats his telegram on the next day to the President:

President GRANT:

The condition of affairs is this: The United States circuit court has decided which is the legal board of canvassers—

Senators, think of it; a United States judge setting up a State Legislature—

Upon the basis of that decision a Legislature has been organized in strict conformity with the laws of the State; Warmoth impeached; and thus Pinchback, as provided by the constitution—becomes acting governor. The chief justice of the supreme court organized the senate into a court of impeachment, and Associate Justice Taliaferro administered the oath to Governor Pinchback.

But does he tell you that this impeachment was all accomplished on the same day, in utter disregard of what the statute of Louisiana requires—without summons to Warmoth, without allowing him to confront and cross-examine witnesses against him, without the report of a committee, which by the very terms of the law are required to report for or against impeachment, after hearing all the facts of the case? and that without a compliance with such requisitions no one can be legally arraigned—

The Legislature was fully organized on Monday. Notwithstanding this, Warmoth has organized a pretended Legislature, and it is proceeding with pretended legislation. A conflict between these two organizations may at any time occur. A conflict may occur at any hour, and in my opinion there is no safety for the legal government—

How cool, in view of Captain Jackson's holding the State-house at that identical hour with two batteries and eighty-six men, and Durell's creation of legal legislators with the bayonet—without the Federal troops are given in compliance with the requisition of the Legislature. The supreme court is known to be in sympathy with the republican State government. If a decided recognition of Governor Pinchback and the legal Legislature were made, in my judgment it would settle the whole matter. General Longstreet has been appointed by Governor Pinchback as adjutant-general of State militia.

JAMES F. CASEY.

This telegram was potential. It has been said that it was the last hair that broke the camel's back. This last telegram certainly broke the ominous silence of the President. The President now speaks through the Attorney-General:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December —, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS.

Against this recognition announced by the Attorney-General Governor Warmoth protested by a telegram to the President, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Under an order from the judge of the United States district court, investing James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and others with the powers and duties of the returning officers under State election laws, and charging them with the duty of completing the legal returns and declaring the result in accordance therewith, those persons have promulgated results based upon no returns whatever and no evidence except ex parte statements. They have constructed a pretended General Assembly, composed mainly of candidates at the election, and those candidates, protected by United States military forces, have taken possession of the State-house and have organized a pretended Legislature, which to-day has passed pretended articles of impeachment against the governor; in pursuance of which the person claiming to be lieutenant-governor, but whose term had expired, proclaimed himself acting governor, broke into the executive office under the protection of the United States soldiers, and took possession of the archives. In the mean time the General Assembly has met at the city hall and organized for business, with sixty members in the house and twenty-one in the senate, being more than a quorum of both bodies. I ask and believe that no violent action be taken and no force used by the Government, at least until the supreme court shall have passed final judgment on the case. A full statement of the facts will be laid before you and the Congress in a few days.

H. C. WARMOTH,
Governor of Louisiana

In the better days of the Republic, such a dispatch from the governor of a State—a governor who had been elected as a republican and the party friend of the President—to that President, informing him directly, that the State-house had been seized by military violence and its archives forcibly taken possession of under a void order of a usurping Federal judge, would have awakened a thrill of indignation, that would have demanded prompt action for the, suppression of the revolution. To all impartial minds, it would seem that a decent respect for the constitution and laws of a sovereign State should have promptly demanded of the President the duty of recognizing no truculent usurper of the executive office of that State at least until the facts could have been fully investigated. Especially, was such an obligation rendered the more imperative upon the President by the fact, that a committee of one hundred of the best citizens of Louisiana had been appointed by an overwhelming mass meeting of the people, called in New Orleans, to protest against any recognition of the revolutionary government of Pinchback, to visit Washington and lay before the President the facts under which the subversion of their government had been accomplished.

John McEnery, the newly elected governor of Louisiana, as shown by the official returns of the only legal returning board that had legal authority to count the votes, also joined his protest against executive action until all the facts touching the legitimacy of the dual governments could be investigated.

NEW ORLEANS, October 12, 1872.

Hon. U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States:

Claiming to be the governor-elect of this State, I beg you, in the name of all justice, to suspend recognition of either of the dual governments now in operation here until there can be laid before you all the facts on both sides touching the legitimacy of either government. The people, denying the legitimacy of the Pinchback government and its legislature, simply ask to be heard through a committee of our best citizens on the eve of departure for Washington before you recognize the one or the other of said governments. I do not believe we will be condemned before we are fully heard.

JNO. McENERY.

Was there anything of which any President of the United States could complain in these manly protests against usupation, perfidy, and wrong in any of these telegrams? Were the requests contained in them not in every respect in behalf of truth, law, good order, justice, and self-government in Louisiana? Were they not eminently peaceful? Yet how were all these appeals received? Let the following telegram of the law-adviser of the President answer:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN McENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

By way of impressing upon the free people of Louisiana that the President had determined to stand by Durell, Pinchback, Casey, and Packard, in their infamous subversion of law and of popular constitutional rights, the Attorney-General telegraphs General Emory as follows:

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1872.

General W. H. EMORY,
United States Army, Commanding, New Orleans:

You may use all necessary force to preserve the peace and will recognize the authority of Governor Pinchback.
By order of the President:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Thus usurpation triumphs. What a lesson? What a result? What a sad page in the history of a free Republic?

When before did any American President use the Army of the United States to uphold the subversion of a State government? When before did the ruler of a free people support a military usurpation? When before did the Executive of the United States aid in trampling down the sovereignty of a State and demand that its people should surrender their rights to acknowledged usurpers?

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud
Without our special wonder?

And yet the official dispatches read by me speak for themselves, and exhibit the sad story of a usurpation unparalleled in constitutional history. A State crushed by the arms of the Federal Government, and the protests of its people answered by contumely and contempt by the legal advisers of the President.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] attempted to justify the President in his support of Durell's acknowledged usurpation upon the ground that the Constitution enjoins the President "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed" and this involves the enforcement of the orders, decrees, and judgments of the courts of the United States, and that the President is never to distinguish between void and valid orders.

I utterly deny the proposition to be law. The President has no more right to aid in the execution of an order of a court, void upon its face for the want of jurisdiction, than the court has to issue it. It is the President's duty to discriminate between lawful orders and those void for want of jurisdiction.

If the proposition insisted upon by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] were conceded to be sound, it would avail him nothing in the defense of the President in permitting Durell's usurpation to be consummated. And that for the reason, that the moment the President became cognizant of the fact, that Durell's order to seize the State-house was void, it was the duty of the President to have withdrawn the troops and dispersed the usurpers. Did he do so? No, sir. With a full reality of the development of Durell's purposes and plans; with full information of the utter want of jurisdiction on the part of that judicial usurper; fully acquainted with his purposes and plans, and that they were in direct violation of the Constitution and laws of Louisiana, the President allowed that void order to be executed and the State-house to be held for more than six weeks. And the President is subject to the greater censure, because the telegrams from Casey, Packard, and Pinchback fully disclosed to him the fact, that the subversion of the rightful government of Louisiana by Durell was for party purposes, and had originated and been carried on for party success.

Is it extraordinary in view of all that then took place, and the passive acquiescence of Congress in these unauthorized and illegal acts of the President, that other usurpations would quickly follow? Can we wonder, after the recognition by the President of Pinchback as governor, of the legality of the Legislature constructed by an illegal returning board, upon mere hypotheses, without returns, with the fact staring him in the face that the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections had reported that this Legislature thus recognized by him, was, without the semblance of validity and was the mere creature of fraud and usurpation, that other and more alarming subversions of popular right in Louisiana should follow?

I admit that it was the duty of Congress instantly on the coming in of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to have intervened, not by a new election, but by a resolution directing him instantly to withdraw the troops. Had that been done there would have been peace. It was not done. The Senate refused to order a new election as recommended by the committee. The dominant party in this Chamber told us, that a new election was unnecessary; that all was quiet in Louisiana; that there would be a popular election in 1874 when the voice of the people of Louisiana would be expressed and its will carried out.

Upon the 3d of November, 1874, that election did take place. It embraced but one State officer, but the election of members of the State Legislature and parish officers imparted to it an exciting interest. Strong personal and excited political considerations entered into the contest. It was but natural, that the conservatives of Louisiana, crushed as they had been under the heel of usurped power for two years past, should look to the ballot-box on the 3d of November, 1874, as the instrument of their deliverance. Let it be remembered that all the agencies and instrumentalities for conducting this election were in the hands of Kellogg and his appointees. In addition, United States troops were scattered throughout the State.

The election law of Louisiana provides for a supervisor of registration, who appoints his own deputies for each ward in New Orleans, and one supervisor of registration in each parish in the State. These officers were all appointed by Governor Kellogg. In addition to these supervisors, the police juries (the local authorities of the parish) appointed three commissioners of election for each poll in the parish, and there were also United States supervisors appointed by the district judge of the United States for each poll. The law further provided—

That in case of such violence, intimidation, or corruption at or near either poll, either during registration or election, as prevented a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote, the commissioners of election if the occurrence was on election day, the supervisors of registration if on the day of registration, should make a full, verified statement of the occurrence, and forward the same with and annexed to the returns; and further provided that when the returning board, in canvassing the returns, should come to any poll where the returns were accompanied by such a protest, they should not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll until the statements from all other polls had been canvassed and compiled.

No State was more thoroughly partisan in its election machinery on the side of Kellogg and his adherents, than Louisiana, on the 3d of November, 1874. The law provides that the returning board shall consist of five persons, from all political parties. On the day of the election in November, 1874, it consisted of five republicans. General Longstreet having resigned, Mr. Arroyo, a conservative, was taken to fill the vacancy. This returning board sat in secret session; Mr. Arroyo protested against the action of this board in secret session, and finally resigned in consequence of their misconduct. His vacancy was not filled. The law was utterly disregarded in the composition of this board both as to numbers and its political complexion.

The conservatives were triumphant in this election on their legislative ticket. A majority of twenty-nine conservatives out of a total of one hundred and eleven members was returned by the commissioners of election, compiled and forwarded by the supervisors of registration. In only a few instances were there any protests accompanying those returns. The returning board thence commenced its secret work of manipulating the returns. The eyes of the country were upon its action. Its composition was partisan, and the former actions of the Lynch board were still fresh in the remembrance of the people. Fraud was predicted—fraud was expected. This returning board was in session many weeks tabulating professedly the returns. A week's work was sufficient to accomplish this work, and yet this board sat for nearly eight weeks without making its returns. This returning board were doctoring the returns with the object of changing the result. Such procrastination was not without its fruits of fraud, forgery, and a successful effort once more to strangle the voice of the people as expressed at the ballot-box under the form of law. The finding of the returning board, as reckoned by Governor Kellogg, gave fifty-three members to the republicans, fifty-three to the democrats, of whom one was regarded as not a staying democrat. The board returned five others to the house of representatives of the Louisiana Legislature without expressing any opinion as to their election.

Again the patience and forbearance of the conservatives were to be rewarded by false returns and fraud of the returning board. Again a conservative majority was to be disregarded. On this point I desire to cite official republican authority. The sub-committee of the House of Representatives who went to New Orleans in December last, composed of CHARLES FOSTER and WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, republicans, and CLARKSON N. POTTER, democrat, in their report say:

The parish of Rapides chose three members of the Legislature; the returns elected all three conservatives. When the proofs closed, the only paper filed with the returning board was the affidavit of the United States supervisor that the election was in all respects full, fair, and free. It was not known in the parish that any contest existed against these members. They left their homes and proceeded to New Orleans to be present at the opening of the Legislature, no intimation of contesting their seats or objection to their election having been given by their opponents. At one of their last sessions the returning board declared all the republican members elected from that parish. When the papers of the returning board were produced before your committee there was found among them an affidavit by Mr. Wells, the president of the board, declaring that intimidation had existed at certain polls in that parish, and that the returns from those polls should therefore be rejected. The counsel for the democratic committee testified that they had had no opportunity to contradict the statements of this paper; that they never had seen or known of it before, and that, upon an examination of the papers before the board when the proofs closed, it was not among them. The counsel for the republican committee reserved the right to make explanation upon this point, but offered none. The affidavit was dated the —— day of December, 1874. It appeared that Governor Wells was not himself in the parish on the day of the election, and though, at the opening of their first session, your committee declared their intention to examine into the action of the returning board, Governor Wells never came forward as a witness. At the close of our proceedings leave was asked that his deposition might be given in. This was declined, and Mr. Wells was himself invited to appear before the committee, but he never came. Leave was also given for taking his testimony by commission, if he desired, but was not availed of.

Your committee are therefore constrained to declare that the action of the returning board in rejecting these returns in the parish of Rapides and giving the seats for that parish to the republican candidates was arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law.

These three members would have given the conservatives a majority in the Legislature. The returning board did not stop at the exclusion of three members from Rapides; they excluded others. Hear the same committee:

So in the parish of De Soto, in which the returns showed a conservative elected by over one thousand majority, it was alleged that the supervisor of registration had brought the returns to New Orleans and had left them with a woman of bad character, who offered to produce them on payment of $1,000. The conservative committee took legal proceedings to compel their production; but the court held that it had no jurisdiction to that end. They then caused to be produced before the board the duplicate of those returns from the office of the secretary of state, together with the tally-sheets, poll-lists, &c., filed there according to law. These duplicates corresponded exactly with the alleged result of the compiled returns which the said woman had produced; and of these alleged facts undisputed proof was also submitted to the board. Nevertheless, the board refused to count the vote for that parish.

So in Winn Parish, where four hundred and four conservative and one hundred and sixty-four republican votes were cast, upon a verbal protest that the registrar of elections was not properly qualified, of which the only proof was that he had failed to forward his oath of office to the secretary of state—although there was no pretense that the election was not a fair representation of the will of the people—the whole vote of the parish was rejected and the case referred to the Legislature.

So in Terre Bonne Parish, where there was a conservative majority, it was proved that the commissioners of election, through misapprehension of their duties, inclosed all the returns in the ballot-boxes, and deposited them with the clerk of the court, with whom the law required the boxes to be left. The judge of the court thereupon issued a mandamus commanding the clerk to take the returns from the boxes and forward them to the secretary of state, which was done. Nevertheless the board rejected the returns from these polls, thereby giving the parish to the republicans, with the result of choosing a republican senator, two republican members of the Legislature, and the republican parish officers.

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house.

Senators, this is republican official testimony of the infamy and falsehood of the returning board. Who will doubt the republicanism of such men as CHARLES FOSTER, of Ohio, and WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, of New Jersey? But I hasten on.

The State-house was thoroughly guarded with Kellogg's police and United States soldiers on the 4th of January, 1875, when the Legislature assembled. That there may be no controversy as to what then took place, I quote again from the committee already referred to who were present and witnessed the assembling and organization of the house. The committee say:

At twelve o'clock noon William Vigers, the clerk of the last house, called the assembly to order and proceeded to call the roll of members as made up from the returns of the returning board. This roll contained the names of one hundred and six members, classed by Governor Kellogg as fifty-three republicans and fifty-three democrats; but it is claimed that one of the democrats was not a "staying democrat." The republicans claimed that one of their members, A. G. Cousin, had been kidnaped and forcibly taken to a distant parish to prevent his presence at the organization of the house. Your committee was about to investigate this charge, when in public session it was claimed by the democratic counsel and admitted by the republican counsel that the arrest was under legal process and by the hands of the sheriff. It was further claimed, and not denied, that the privilege of his office did not shield him from arrest. The charge was embezzlement.

The full house would contain one hundred and eleven members, of which fifty-six would be a quorum. On this first call of the roll one hundred and two answered to their names. It is claimed by the republicans, and we believe conceded by the democrats, that fifty of those answering to their names were democrats, and fifty-two were republicans. The instant the clerk finished the roll-call, several members rose to their feet; but the floor was successfully held by Mr. Billieu, who said that he nominated L. A. Wiltz as temporary chairman. The clerk suggested that the legal motion was to elect a speaker. Mr. Billieu himself, paying no attention to the clerk, proceeded hurriedly to put his own motion, which was received by loud yeas, and followed by as loud nays, and declared it carried. Mr. Wiltz sprung instantly to the platform, took from the clerk the gavel, was quickly sworn in by Justice Houston, who followed him to the platform, and then rapped the house, which, during this time had been in great confusion, into a temporary quiet. Mr. Wiltz, as temporary chairman, administered the oath to the members en masse, who rose to receive it. Some member made a motion to elect Terzevant clerk. Wiltz put the motion and declared it carried. Terzevant at once came forward and took the clerk's chair; immediately after, and with the same haste, a Mr. Flood was elected sergeant-at-arms, and at once, whether on motion or not your committee do not remember, a number of assistant sergeants-at-arms were appointed, who promptly appeared wearing badges, on which were printed "assistant sergeant-at-arms."

The house then proceeded to elect a speaker. The roll was called by the clerk, Terzevant, who reported 55 votes for Wiltz, and 2 votes for Hahn, and 1 (Mr. Wiltz's own) blank. This result was ascertained by the clerk by simply keeping a tally of the members voting as they answered to their names. No roll of members voting was kept; neither were tellers ordered, or any other means employed than calling the roll to ascertain the number voting. This vote includes the five members who had been sworn in to fill vacancies. During this roll-call, when Mr. Hahn's name was called, he rose and asked to be excused from voting, and to be allowed to state his reasons. Objection was made, and then the speaker pro tempore asked for unanimous consent to his explanation. Consent was given, and Mr. Hahn spoke at some length. After the announcement by the clerk of the vote, Wiltz was sworn in as speaker, and proceeded to swear in others present so far as they came forward to be sworn.

Those thus sworn in were said to number sixty in all—made up of fifty conservatives and five republicans, who were returned by the returning board, and the five democratic members who had just been admitted. Outside the bar of the legislative hall, in the State-house, there were a large number of police, supported by the Federal troops. No person was permitted to the State-house except through the orders of Governor Kellogg. Within the bar of the house were permitted only the gentlemen returned by the returning board and clerk and sergeant-at-arms of the former Legislature, ten persons allowed to the conservatives as messengers, who suddenly became their assistant sergeants-at-arms, and a few other persons, such as were admitted by courtesy to the floor.

If no person was permitted in the State-house except through Kellogg—these five ejected members had his permission to enter—and were not usurpers! They had been elected—had been sworn in as members by the speaker—they had no contests for the seats. Who claims under facts like these that they were usurpers?

The action of the body proceeded for an hour or so without interruption, during which time a committee on contested seats was appointed, minor officers elected, and debate had, but no message was sent to the senate or governor notifying them that the house was organized and ready to proceed to business; when at length Colonel De Trobriand returned and stated he had orders to remove the five members sworn in who had not been returned by the returning board, and after the protest and resistance of Mr. Wiltz to the persons referred to, and after General Campbell had been sent for to point them out they were removed by the United States soldiers. Wiltz then left the chair, as Vigers, to organize the house, began to call the roll of the returning board. Two democratic members had answered to their names when Wiltz interrupted the clerk and called upon the conservative members to refuse to answer and to leave the hall. The interruption over, Vigers began anew his roll-call, and obtained only fifty-two responses; but as the two democratic members had just before answered on the roll-call which was interrupted, he assumed it right to announce fifty-four members had answered to their names. Those who remained after Mr. Wiltz and his friends withdrew, elected Hahn speaker by acclamation, and proceeded to the business of the Legislature. There was no subsequent roll-call by which the number of those members whose names were returned by the returning board, and who still remained present at these deliberations, could be determined.

The 4th of January is an eventful day in English annals. It may hereafter become not less so in American history. In both, it marks the assault of arbitrary power upon constitutional right and privilege. On that day, that ill-advised, unfortunate monarch Charles I, after having vainly sent the day before his officers to arrest five members of the house of Commons for treason, entered himself the hall, and having taken the speaker's chair, asked him "Whether any of the five members that he came to apprehend were in the house; whether he saw any of them, and where they were?" Speaker Lenthall replied:

May it please your majesty, I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here; and humbly beg your majesty's pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me.

Charles I took nothing by his movement and the constitutional privileges of the members of Parliament were preserved against unlicensed power.

Upon the 4th of January, 1875, the Legislature of a sovereign State, duly elected by a free people under the forms of law, enter their State-house. They meet to legislate on a day and at a place fixed by the law of their State. They organize by the election of a speaker and other officers. They are proceeding to business, when an officer of the United States Army, General De Trobriand, at the request of William Pitt Kellogg, enters and demands of the speaker that five members of that body shall be pointed out for arrest by order of the governor. The speaker like Lenthall indignantly declines and manfully protests; but these five members are pointed out by some more loyal hanger-on upon the skirts of power and instantly, by military force, are forcibly ejected from that hall.

Whether that day shall mark the era of decadence and rapid descent of the American Republic from life to death, from liberty to despotism, or be hailed hereafter, as the glorious hour at which the American people, irrespective of party, alarmed at the usurpation and violation of the Constitution, rallied with unanimity and power to the rescue of constitutional free government, and by their rebuke of usurpation placed it on perpetual foundations, the future must decide. In either contingency, the events of the 4th of January, 1875, will become a memorable way-mark in American progress.

The dominant party insist, that the five ejected members had no right of ingress to the legislative hall of Louisiana, and that, being usurpers, it was right to exclude them by force. Who had a right to exclude them?

Kellogg? by whose order De Trobiand acted? By what clause in any State constitution does the Governor derive the power to pass upon the title, or qualification of members of a State Legislature? If no such power exists, and I defy its production, then Kellogg's order to De Trobiand was an act of infamous usurpation.

But I deny that the five members who were expelled by military force were in that hall without right. They had been legally elected. The returning board, with all its infamy, did not reject these five members. For the fraudulent purposes of party, in violation of their sworn duty imposed by law to decide every case, this board did decline to decide upon the title of these five representatives whom they knew were legally elected, and whose seats were not contested, and fraudulently for party purposes withheld certificates of election. They, however, referred the case of these five members to the Legislature, and that body, clothed with the exclusive and sole power by the constitution of Louisiana to pass upon the election qualifications and returns of its members, declared these members duly elected by swearing them in.

The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] whom we all know to be usually so calm and dignified, went off into a paroxysm of ire at the conduct of Wiltz in organizing the Legislature. That Senator denounced him as a revolutionist, a usurper, an outlaw, and said if he had been a member of the Legislature, he would have agreed to have been one of a body to drag Wiltz from the chair. This is strong language. What was Wiltz's crime? He was nominated by a conservative member as temporary chairman; the question was put by the member nominating him, carried, and Wiltz was escorted to the chair. Wiltz as presiding officer refused to put certain questions or to allow the ayes and noes to be called before the organization was completed, from which ruling there was no appeal. All these proceedings the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says were unprecedented and revolutionary. In what particular were the proceedings revolutionary? I am astonished to hear the Senator say that the proceedings were unprecedented. He has had large experience in both branches of Congress, but has certainly forgotten several precedents with which I desire to refresh his memory. Cushing says:

> It has often occurred that struggles for political power have begun among the members of our legislative assemblies before their organization; and it has happened, on the one hand, that persons whose rights of membership were in dispute and who had not the legal and regular evidence of election have taken upon themselves the functions of members, and on the other, that persons having the legal evidence of membership have been excluded from participating in the proceedings.—Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, page 91.

Here is an authority directly overruling the Senator's statement as to precedent. Does not the Senator remember the broad-seal contest from New Jersey in the House of Representatives in 1839? Two sets of members appeared claiming seats, the whig members having the broad seal, the democrats having the seal of the secretary of state.

Hugh A. Garland, the old Clerk, refused to put the names of either set on the roll, and refused to take questions by yeas and nays until there was an organization. This controversy continued for weeks and prevented the organization of the House of Representatives. During the contest F. W. Pickens, a Representative from South Carolina, arose and, disregarding the Clerk, moved that Lewis Williams be declared the temporary presiding officer. Mr. Williams declined; whereupon Mr. Pickens nominated Mr. John Quincy Adams, and putting the question himself, he declared it carried and escorted Mr. Adams to the chair. Mr. Adams, in putting motions to the House, declared that the members having the broad-seal certificates were entitled to vote. From this decision an appeal was taken and the decision of Mr. Adams was reversed. Other precedents might be cited.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] insists, that because the five ejected members had not certificates of their election from the returning board they had no right to enter the hall, even though they had been legally elected to the Legislature. Had there been conflicting claimants to these five seats there would be some force in this position. But there were none. The doctrine insisted upon by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is monstrous. It would place the organization of the Legislature in the power of any fraudulent, false, returning board.

I have a precedent directly upon this point. That members actually elected, but who have no certificates, have a right to vote on the organization of a Legislature in preference to those who have certificates, but were not elected. Nobody has or can say that the five ejected members were not elected. They had no certificates. Did that prevent their qualification? Clearly not. That position received the sanction of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] very recently in this body. In the contest of F. W. Sykes against George E. Spencer for a seat in this Chamber as the Senator-elect from Alabama that very question was involved and was decided. There were two bodies claiming to be the Legislature. One assembled at the State-house in Montgomery, with a quorum of both branches and every member having his certificate. That body known as the State-house Legislature proceeded to count the votes for governor and was recognized by the outgoing governor as the Legislature. F. W. Sykes was duly elected by that Legislature. Another body, claiming also to be the Legislature, assembled at the court-house and organized. The latter body had no quorum, unless some seven or eight members who had no certificates of election were allowed to be sworn in. The court-house legislature elected Hon. GEORGE E. SPENCER, now the Senator from Alabama. A majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, through the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] reported in favor of Mr. SPENCER, and that report was ratified by the Senate. Upon the identical question now raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the five members of the Louisiana election ejected by De Trobriand had no right to participate in the preliminary proceedings because they had no certificates from the returning board, although those five members had been elected without contest, the committee say:

> Therefore, in determining as to the right of Spencer or Sykes to this seat, the Senate is compelled to choose between the body in fact elected, organized, acting, and recognized by the executive department as the Legislature, and another body, organized in form, but without the election and without a recognition on the part of the executive of the State at the time they pretended to elect Sykes. When we consider that all the forms prescribed by law for canvassing and certifying an election and for the organization of the two houses are designed to secure to the persons actually elected the right to act in the offices to which in fact they have been elected, it would be sacrificing the end to the means were the Senate to adhere to the mere form, and thus defeat the end which the forms were intended to secure.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] concurred by a vote of yeas and nays in that report, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] was seated upon votes of members of the court-house legislature, who had no certificates, and had given no notice of contest to the members from the same counties in the State-house legislature, who held certificates and were qualified. Where was the indignation of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] then? If his argument as urged against the five members in Louisiana be logical, he should have remonstrated against the election of the sitting member from Alabama as illegal and revolutionary instead of voting to seat him. I am amazed at such party inconsistency!

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] was still more emphatic in the Sykes and Spencer controversy, that the right of members in a Legislature legally elected, without returns, were superior to the rights of members who had regular returns, but who were not elected. "Form," said he, "must always give way to substance." I mean no disrespect to the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER,] but a greater outrage upon both the regularity and validity of legislative proceedings was never committed in my judgment than in the vote of the Senate which accorded him the seat over Sykes, his contestant.

The Legislature was the only body under the constitution of Louisiana that could pass on the title of the five ejected members, and having admitted them, and the other party having yielded, waived all irregularity in the proceedings. The ejection of these five legislators was therefore a bold, daring, ribald act of usurpation by the military which finds no excuse or justification either in the irregularities of its organization and still less in the void order of the usurping Governor Kellogg. It was a natural sequence to the revolution accomplished by Durell in 1872, and follows it as naturally as that water finds its own level.

Why was General Sheridan sent to Louisiana? Everything was quiet on December 24, 1874. And if so, there was no public necessity for his being sent there. Why was the letter from the Secretary of War to General Sheridan dated 24th of December, 1874, marked confidential? Why does the Secretary of War in that letter to Sheridan say:

> It is best that the trip should appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business for the fact of your mere presence in the locality referred to will have, it is presumed, a beneficial effect?

Now, this is certainly unusual! An order by the War Department to the Lieutenant-General of the Army asking a quasi concealment of the fact that his visit was official.

Why was it secret? Why was not the General of the Army selected for this mission, if peace was its object? General Sherman had lived for years in Louisiana, was known to its people, and possessed their respect, confidence, and regard. Why was Sheridan selected over him? Especially, why were these official communications from the Secretary of War to General Sheridan dated 24th of December, 1874, concealed for several days from Sherman and McDowell? Why were they not, as other orders are, communicated through the General of the Army? Sheridan acknowledges receipt of the letter of the Secretary of War on 24th of December, 1874, on 26th of December, while General Sherman does not acknowledge the letter of the Secretary of War of 26th of December with inclosures until the 30th of December, 1874. These are pertinent questions in view of what transpired on January 4, 1875.

General Sheridan, with full authority to assume the command of the Department of the Gulf, reached New Orleans on the 1st of January, 1875. On the 4th of January he sends the following telegram to the Secretary of War:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 4.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to laws and murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either; and the civil government appears powerless to punish, or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Upon that day a Legislature had been subverted by the governor of Louisiana through the intervention of United States soldiers! Not a word from the Lieutenant-General of this startling supremacy of the military over the civil authority. His telegram is aimed at the insecurity of life and the disregard of law; and yet the utter prostration of the constitution and law is not alluded to.

How could General Sheridan know what the condition of Louisiana was in three days? Kellogg was governor, with the United States Army at his back and the entire State machinery under his control. Why was not "defiance to law" suppressed?

But the people of New Orleans intended that no such aspersions as that contained in Sheridan's first telegram should soil their escutcheon. Hence a public meeting at the merchants' exchange resolved:

Be it resolved, That we condemn as a positive untruth and as a libel upon the community the statement of General Sheridan, contained in the above; that we deny herewith that the spirit of defiance against lawful authority exists and that the lives of citizens have become jeopardized thereby.

Resolved, That we emphatically condemn, as law-abiding citizens, and do most solemnly and earnestly protest against the military interference with and the disorganization of the Legislature of Louisiana, which was duly elected by ourselves and the citizens of the State.

So, too, the cotton exchange board repelled the unworthy reflection of General Sheridan upon the condition of New Orleans by a preamble and resolutions.

Whereas General P. H. Sheridan, commanding the Military Division of Missouri, has seen fit to address to the honorable Secretary of War a letter, dated January 4, and published in our papers of this date, in which he has given utterance to statements reflecting upon the people of this State, and particularly of such as reside in this city, singularly at variance with the condition of things now and heretofore existing in this city and State, and well calculated not only to detract from our good name as law-loving and law-abiding citizens, but also to seriously injure the commercial interests of our city, the cotton exchange, an organization totally disconnected from political affairs, and instituted solely for the promotion of commercial interests, feels called upon to enter a solemn protest against the allegations contained in said letter.

The members of this exchange give solemn assurance to the people of the United States and to the friends of truth and justice wherever found, that the allegations of General Sheridan are not only false in point of fact, but evince the spirit of a mere partisan rather than the nobility of a soul which should characterize the utterances of an officer commanding the Army of a great nation. It is painfully evident that, coming among us an almost entire stranger, General Sheridan has limited his inquiries into the condition of affairs here to those whose interests it is not only to falsify facts but to promote that spirit of lawlessness with which we are falsely charged. It would not indeed be a matter of surprise if crimes in our midst were more frequent, when it is borne in mind that the police force, for the maintenance of which we are heavily taxed, is now, and has been, diverted from its legitimate duties to such an extent that large districts of our city are entirely without protection, and many of our citizens are compelled to employ private watchmen for protection against thieves and burglars.

The injustice and utter recklessness of Sheridan's wholesale defamation of a brave and gallant people, crushed for two years under the oppressive yoke of usurpation, contained in his first telegram, was further repudiated by the bishops of five distinct religious denominations in New Orleans by the following telegram:

Whereas General Sheridan, now in command of the Division of the Missouri, under the date of the 4th instant, has addressed a communication to Hon. W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, in which he represents the people of Louisiana at large as breathing vengeance to all lawful authority and approving of murders and crimes: We, the undersigned, believe it our duty to proclaim to the whole American people that these charges are unmerited, unfounded, and erroneous, and can have no other effect than that of serving the interests of corrupt politicians, who are at this moment making the most extreme efforts to perpetuate their power over the State of Louisiana.

N. J. PERCHE,
Archbishop of New Orleans.
J. P. B. WILMER,
Bishop of Louisiana.
JAMES K. GUTHERIM,
Pastor Temple of Sinai.
J. C. KEENER,
Bishop M. E. Church South.
C. DOLL,
Rector St. Joseph's Church. (And many others.)

But the partisan ire of General Sheridan, seems to have been increased. Telegram after telegram followed in quick succession. I read one of the 5th of January, 1875, to the Secretary of War from the Lieutenant-General:

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

What startling suggestions! They shocked the humanity of Christendom! To arrest a whole community, declare them banditti, try them by drum-head court-martial, and execute them at once! It awakened a thrill of indignation throughout the country. The very thought was strangely cruel. But how was it received at Washington? Let the Secretary of War answer:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 6, 1875.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
New Orleans:

Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

"All of us" would naturally include the President and all his Cabinet. "Thoroughly approve your course" would seem to include the approval of all Sheridan's recommendations. But I can scarcely believe that all the Cabinet did approve the "banditti policy" and "military-trial policy" of Lieutenant-General Sheridan.

I saw "more in sorrow than in anger" that the President of the United States was inclined to defend Sheridan even if he did not approve his policy. I read from the special message of the President on Louisiana affairs on January 13, 1875. Speaking of Sheridan's recommendations, he says:

No party motives or prejudices can reasonably be imputed to him; but honestly convinced by what he has seen and heard there, he has characterized the leaders of the White Leagues in severe terms, and suggested summary modes of procedure against them, which, though they cannot be adopted, would, if legal, soon put an end to the troubles and disorders in that State. General Sheridan was looking at facts, and possibly, not thinking of proceedings which would be the only proper ones to pursue in time of peace, thought more of the utterly lawless condition of society surrounding him at the time of his dispatch and of what would prove a sure remedy. He never proposed to do an illegal act, nor expressed determination to proceed beyond what the law in the future might authorize for the punishment of the atrocities which have been committed and the commission of which cannot be successfully denied.

These are strange words to emanate from the President of the United States to an American Congress.

The Lieutenant-General of the Army, in time of great internal dissension in a State already crushed by military power, with self-government subverted by military usurpation, recommends to the President of the United States that Congress ought to declare a portion of its people "banditti," in order that he may subject them to military trials in time of peace and dispose of them summarily in order to restore peace and suppress lawlessness! To this most startling suggestion the President of the United States tells Congress that—

Although this summary mode of procedure against the people of Louisiana cannot be adopted, it would, if legal, soon put an end to the troubles and disorders in that State.

But for the inhibition of the law, we must then understand that the President would concur in this recommendation of his Lieutenant-General. Is it for this reason that a force bill is to be enacted suspending the writ of habeas corpus? And have we actually reached that point in the downward tendency toward the overthrow of constitutional government?

A great lawyer once truly said, that since the revolution of 1688 law has been the basis of liberty. That is true, and should never be forgotten. Written constitutions are ordained to perpetuate and preserve the great principles of human right which were prior to and preceded them. Habeas corpus, the bill of rights, trial by jury, freedom of conscience, and exemption from arbitrary power are surer bulwarks of liberty and right, than any written constitutions. These principles of liberty and law were sought to be intrenched in our complex system of American representative government by checks and limitations on legislative, executive, and judicial power. They were safeguards around liberty and justice. Republican Senators, listen! I beseech you to listen to a gifted leader in your own party ranks, who, against the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, by Mr. Lincoln in time of war—a President of his own party views—breaking the shackles of party, rang out an eloquent warning against the violation of law. He has passed away, but his words remain to warn us of danger.

I will trust the President with the administration of the laws, but I will not trust him to make them nor go beyond them. I will trust him with all the great deposit of power that the Constitution has placed in his hands, that vast power which, when it is called forth in the magnificence of its military array, blinds the eye accustomed only to the habiliments of peace; but I will not add to it a dictatorship—arbitrary and discretionary powers without the guidance and above the control of written law. I protest against it in the name of republican liberty. I protest against it in the name of every limitation in the Constitution under which we live. I protest against it in the name of those Englishmen who defied in arms their king because he claimed over them discretionary, unlimited power; and of those fathers of the Constitution who in this country followed in their footsteps, were lighted by their wisdom, were guided by their example, and embodied in a law paramount to the varying will of the people the necessary restrictions upon the frailties of human nature. I turn with reverence to the great northern light of the Constitution, the Newton of this great system—which is heaven while it is order, but will be chaos if discretion rule it—to guide my footsteps in this hour of darkness, and with him I read inscribed on the foundations of the Government these cardinal principles: first, government by representation; next, that solemn declaration that the will of the majority—not of newspapers nor of public meetings; the will of the majority, not in a fright, not in a panic, not divined from apparent necessity, but solemnly declared according to the forms of law—shall have the force of law; then, that there shall be a written constitution, defining and carefully limiting the powers conferred upon the men charged to represent the people and restricting their discretion. In that great last legacy of the great northern statesman, when he was speaking as it were to future ages and telling them by the grandest enumeration that ever summed up a nation's progress of the elements of our prosperity, our power, our advancement, and the glories of our achievements, in that great oration he thought it important to call to the minds of his fellow-citizens that these glorious results were not the offspring of mob law, or of arbitrary discretion, of despotism disguised as democracy, which rules across the water, or of military law, or of law made for the exigency by executive usurpation, or of the law of necessity, or of the law of the safety of the people, but that the fountain from which all flowed was the rigid adherence to written law, to the will of the people proclaimed in constitutional forms. It was law so enacted that he proclaimed to be supreme.

These words were uttered in the midst of war, when the two sections of our country were engaged in a gigantic civil strife, unexampled in its proportions. But even then, amid the clash of arms, one republican voice pleaded for the Constitution! Will you not now, in time of peace, listen to his warnings?

Mr. President, I listened, as I always do, to the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in his defense the other day of the President and General Sheridan, before an audience never surpassed in the galleries and corridors of this Chamber. We know his power. I was attentive, as we all were, to the effort of the eloquent Senator on that occasion, but I failed to realize in it, any legal defense for the recent usurpations in Louisiana. My deduction was, if the Senator from New York could not successfully defend the Government, that then it was beyond defense. The Senator's speech recalled to my mind an incident in an admiralty case, argued in the Supreme Court of the United States in 1815 and reported in 9 Cranch's Reports.

The Nereide, an English vessel, was captured by the United States frigate Governor Tompkins as a prize of war. Mr. William Pinkney, of Maryland, afterward Attorney-General, and the recognized leader of the American bar in his time, insisted that certain goods shipped by a Buenos Ayres merchant on the Nereide, who claimed to be a neutral, were a legal prize of war.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Marshall, for the first and the only time in his judicial life, paid Mr. Pinkney this compliment:

> With a pencil dipped in the most vivid colors and guided by the hand of a master a splendid portrait has been drawn exhibiting this vessel and her freighter as forming a single figure, composed of the most discordant materials—of peace and war. So exquisite was the skill of the artist, so dazzling the garb in which the figure was presented, that it required the exercise of that cold investigating faculty which ought always to belong to those who sit on this bench to discover its only imperfection—its want of resemblance.

Brilliant as was the speech of the Senator; burning as was his invective against the downtrodden South; thrilling as was his portrait of the Lieutenant-General leading to victory his embattled host; ready and biting as was the Senator's satire against those who took up arms against the Government; and denunciatory as he was against the White League, he yet failed to exhibit one iota of constitutional authority justifying the President and General Sheridan in their late revolutionary inroads and utter subordination of the civil to the military authority in Louisiana. Far be it from me to detract from the eloquence of that speech. It wanted, as I thought, one salient ingredient—an utter lack of resemblance to the issues involved in this debate. It is wonderful that republican Senators should seek to justify or to palliate open, downright violations of the Constitution, which seek for their object, the subversion of the self-government of the States by military power. What warrant is there in the Constitution for the outrages in New Orleans on the 4th of January? What if there have been murders and violence in Louisiana? Why have they not been suppressed by the civil authorities of the State? Does the dominant party insist that any disturbance of the internal peace and quiet of a State, empowers the President to invade that State? Is not the Federal Government the common government of all the States, with specially delegated powers, expressed in a written Constitution, necessary to carry into effect the objects in which they have a common interest, and none other? Have not the States their own separate and peculiar governments, ordained by their own separate constitutions and laws, to which separate State governments and the people all other powers not delegated are reserved? Among the latter, are not the protection, internal peace, and safety of the people directly included?

Give to the guarantee clause of the Constitution its proper interpretation, and the President's interference in the affairs of Louisiana can find no valid justification whatever. That section contains three distinct stipulations and guarantees: first, that of a republican form of government to every State in the Union; second, that of protection to each against invasion; and, third, that against domestic violence on the application of the Legislature, or the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened. The States themselves are the parties; that is, the people of the several States, as forming distinct sovereign communities, and organized under respective governments with separate State constitutions. The language is "the United States shall guarantee to every State"—mark the expression—the stipulations above quoted. That clause was devised by the fathers as a guard against dangers from without and from within. Its clear object was to protect the State governments, by placing each under the protection of the united power of all the States against such domestic force or violence as might endanger or destroy it from within, and where the power of the State was impotent to prevent it. Our fathers inserted this guarantee as an agency or means by which the liberty of every State might be preserved.

The "domestic violence" enumerated, must be directed against its own State government, and protection of it is the direct and immediate object of the guarantee. Any other, would be violence offered by individuals against individuals, and would fall within the jurisdiction of the local authorities and State courts. That it was the protection of the government of the State which the guarantee contemplated, is I think clearly shown by the express provision that the protection shall be on the application of the Legislature, or its governor if the Legislature cannot be convened. The government of the State, and not the Federal Government, is vested with the sole power, not only of determining whether there has been such a case of domestic violence as the Constitution contemplates, but also of the necessity and propriety of the application for protection. This delicate power was further hedged in by the laws passed at an early day, touching Federal interference in cases provided for in the guarantee clause. It is only upon the express conditions contained in the statute, that the Federal Government has any power, or right to interfere. What shadow of authority then had the President to allow soldiers to be used in sustaining Durell in a usurpation on the government of Louisiana, against which this very guarantee was intended as a bulwark?

Will republican Senators tell us by what clause in the Constitution was Kellogg authorized to call upon Federal soldiers to eject five members of the Louisiana Legislature? The only constitutional tribunal in Louisiana which was clothed with the power of determining the qualification, election, and returns of its own members was the Legislature. That body had already decided in favor of these five members before such forcible ejection by military power had taken place. If Louisiana had no legal government, then there was no government or Legislature who could call on the President to intervene. If McEnery and his legislature were elected in 1872, as the returns showed, then that legislature made no call upon the President.

But the republican Senators tell us of the murders at Coushatta and of other acts of violence and disorder in Louisiana. Can that extend the powers or destroy the limitations of the Constitution of the United States as to Federal interference? Those outbreaks were the violence of individuals toward one another, and not within the guarantee clause, as I have already shown.

Mr. President, I am no apologist for violence or outbreaks anywhere. If crime exists, punish it, but punish it by law and through the agencies of law. But do not, I pray you, violate your fundamental law by permitting human life to be sacrificed outside of law. Valiant and brave as General Sheridan is, much as the country is said to owe the President for his military services, do not permit either of them to violate the Constitution. The Constitution is the sheet-anchor of liberty. Ready obedience to its behests is the only bulwark of popular safety. That question is as far above party as the heaven is above the earth. Parties spring out of diverse policies, but the maintenance of the Constitution, or its open violation, involves the question of liberty or despotism.

Obsta principiis! Let all parties resist the first open violation of the great charter of American self-government. Patriotic men at the formation of the Constitution were in favor of a strong government. Many now insist upon an entire change in our federative system. They want a stronger government. I do not question their sincerity. I heard but a few weeks since, the Attorney-General in arguing a case from Kentucky in the Supreme Court of the United States upon the constitutionality of the enforcement act, say, that he despised States' rights; that they embarrassed the Government in the execution of the laws. The Attorney-General further added, "that Mr. Lincoln had once said, that these States could not exist half slave and half free." He, upon his responsibility, before that august tribunal would say, that this Government could not exist, if its operations were to be impeded or embarrassed by the so-called rights of the States. For himself he did not hesitate to announce, that he was for a Federal government unimpeded by States' rights but still maintaining our free institutions. The Attorney-General only openly proclaimed on that occasion what a great many public men of the republican party wish and desire. A centralized government unimpeded, and unobstructed by State rights! That involves a change in our federative system of government under which we have so far prospered, and under which, the liberty won by our fathers has been so far preserved. Are the people ready for that change? I hope not, I believe not!

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] told us in his speech, that the discussion of Louisiana affairs opened the presidential campaign of 1876. I had not supposed so. If the condemnation or the justification of Durell's usurpation and subversion of the State government of Louisiana by military Federal power; if Kellogg's usurpation of the executive office of the same State and his subsequent invasion with bayonets of the legal Legislature of that Commonwealth on the 4th of January, 1875; if the approval of Sheridan's dispatch recommending Congress to declare the leaders of the White League "banditti," that they might be tried by drum-head courts-martial and speedily executed—if these are to be the issues in the next presidential canvass, we are thankful to the honorable Senator for his information.

But let me tell that honorable Senator, it will not be a strict party contest if Louisiana usurpation and misrule are to become main issues. I tell him the great mass of the people, irrespective of party, will rally to the defense of the Constitution. The republicans will separate upon the Louisiana issues. The people are for no change in our Government. They will condemn all violations of the Constitution by whomsoever committed. Republican jurists condemn the Louisiana-Kellogg usurpation as much as I do. I find in the International Review for January and February, 1875, an article on this guarantee article of the Constitution by Judge T. M. Cooley, a republican of note, a friend of the President. I ask the Secretary to read the paragraph I have marked.

The case of Louisiana in 1872-'73 no attempt has been made of late to justify on the principles of the Constitution; and without entering into a discussion of its facts, we leave it as it was presented in the Senate report of February 20, 1873, where it stands as a case of undeniable usurpation. The conclusions of fact in that report were concurred in by some of the ablest lawyers of the nation, representing all political parties, and they were supported and illustrated by the speeches of Mr. CARPENTER and others, delivered in the Senate in 1874. With these speeches may usefully be read and considered that of a person who was prominent in the whole affair—an adventurer made politician by the times—who for a while under military protection, but without a shadow of right, acted as governor; who had the surprising assurance to claim an election to both Houses of the same Congress and to contest a seat in each, and who, as the agent of the Associated Press in his official report informs us, treated the House to a "humorous" speech in describing the mockery of right, justice, and law, which, as he declared, had been substituted for an election in that unhappy State. There can be nothing to compare with such "humor" but the "amusement" with which the friends and supporters of the governor in one of the reconstructed States are said to have received the announcement that he had been indicted for the larceny of public moneys.

Mr. STEVENSON. The dominant majority in this Chamber should read carefully this able article of Judge Cooley and ponder carefully its wise suggestions. I commend it especially to the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] Judge Cooley speaks, I doubt not, the sentiment of a large number of patriotic men within the republican party. Many immense meetings in several cities, both in the North and West, have been called to protest against this last Louisiana usurpation. I recall especially that held at Cooper Institute, New York. A venerable man, full of years and full of honor, widely known throughout our own and foreign lands as a scholar, an editor, an author, and a patriot, presided over that meeting. What a clear, ringing protest was his opening speech against lawless power! How clearly he counseled his countrymen against the danger of excusing a solitary violation of the Constitution of the United States by whomsoever committed. Who can doubt the republicanism of William C. Bryant? Who will doubt his patriotism? See, too, how nobly the resolves of that meeting against the revolutionary proceedings of January 4, 1875, and the revolutionary telegrams of General Sheridan, were seconded by Evarts, Curtis, and a host of other prominent republicans. All honor to those patriotic men! The Constitution will never perish while the whole country rallies to its rescue irrespective of party.

Many leading republicans, who condemn as strongly as any others the course of the President and Sheridan in Louisiana, were kept away from the New York meeting by a belief that it was gotten up by democrats, and they did not care to criticise and condemn republican rulers under the semblance of democratic auspices. Such is human nature. I saw a letter to the New York Tribune from a well-known distinguished republican of Pennsylvania. I have not the honor of his acquaintance, but he speaks and writes like a patriot. He is evidently a man of unquestioned ability. No one will doubt his devotion to the republican party, for evidently he thinks it has a glorious future, not however by excusing or justifying either the President or Sheridan. I quote a portion of his letter:

Without further evidence I will not believe that the party which attained a national existence by its unswerving opposition to the "crime against Kansas" will give even a tacit approval to an exactly similar "crime against Louisiana"—a persistent effort to force upon a free people a government which they do not desire. The apologies in each case were the same, but they did not deceive the common sense of the American citizen in the one case and they will not deceive it in the other.

Every step in the progress of this usurpation has been closely scanned by large numbers of the voters of the republican party; and the last acts in the wretched drama, the interference of the military forces of the General Government in the organization of the State Legislature and the dispatches of General Sheridan were so utterly lawless and in such flagrant violation of all the traditions of our history, as well as of all the principles on which our liberties rest, that they are certain to secure their own condemnation with such emphasis as will make any repetition of them impossible. The republican party I believe will be foremost to insist that in time of peace the subordination of the military to the civil power shall be universal and absolute, and that the barriers between the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of Government shall not be at the mercy of the bayonet or depend upon the discretion of any soldier, however well he may have deserved of his country.

Faithfully, yours,

HARRISBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA, January 13, 1875.

The dominant party while they do not openly defend and justify the use of the United States Army by Durell, Packard, Kellogg & Co. to create bogus legislatures, to inaugurate usurping governors, to subvert State Legislatures, dwell upon the lawlessness and disorders of the South, and heap upon the White Leagues the vials of their wrath and indignation. I repeat, I am no apologist for wrong and violence anywhere. All my influence, humble as it is, has been and always shall be exercised in favor of the rigid observance of the law and the prompt punishment of all who violate it. I have no doubt acts of violence have been done and that murders have been committed in Louisiana. But what State is without blame in this particular? Do not gross violations of law occur everywhere? Do you intend to oppress a free people by military force and then malign them falsely with the commision of crime to justify your usurpation? How ungenerous! How unjust!

Mr. President, the whites of the South bear no hatred to the colored race. The destiny, success, and prosperity of the two races are too intimately blended to justify wrong or injustice from one toward the other. Had both races been let alone and not interfered with by venal intermeddlers for selfish purposes, peace, good government, and prosperity would long since have blessed Louisiana as it has done Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, and which it will soon do in Arkansas and Alabama. But political adventurers, actuated by sordid and selfish purposes, coin and exaggerate these stories of wrong and outrage to excite republicans in Congress and the northern people against the South for mere political effect. But these selfish, sordid partisans and mischief-makers do more. They designedly stir up strife and hostility of the colored race against the whites by appealing to their superstition and ignorance, and incite violence not only against the whites but against their own colored brethren who act and vote with the white conservatives. Why? Simply that they may provoke disorder and bloodshed in order to call in Federal aid and United States soldiers to perpetuate their usurped political power in the South.

By a letter of Hon. A. H. BUCKNER, a member of Congress from Missouri, who was one of a commiteee of the House, to visit Alabama and to inquire into these "southern outrages," in a letter to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] says that his investigation established the fact that a large number of these alleged outbreaks in the South were between the colored people alone, and sprang from the effort of the truly loyal colored republican to inflict violence upon his colored brother for voting the conservative ticket. I do not doubt myself that these sordid political intriguers took possession of General Sheridan, deceived him by exaggerated stories of violence and outrage, and so inflamed his mind and blinded his vision as to elicit his "banditti" dispatch.

Senators, these things ought not so to be. The utter falsity of the charge against the white conservatives in Louisiana toward the colored race stares you in the face. We know that the conservatives are in an overwhelming majority. The cries of Kellogg, Pinchback, Packard, and Casey upon the President for help, prove this. If half the stories of cruelty, wrong, and outrage sent to Congress and scattered through the North for partisan purposes were true, why, I ask, have not the miscreants who for base and party purposes circulate and utter these falsehoods long since fallen victims to the hate of their oppressors? But yet the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] told us, after Kellogg's recognition by the President, during the debate on the proposal for a new election in Louisiana, that all was peace and quiet in Louisiana!

Fortunately for the country we have some official testimony touching the White League. Republican Senators have again and again denounced them as Ku-Klux, as banditti, as outlaws. Who are they? Let a committee of the House of Representatives, composed of two republicans and one democrat, answer officially that question. They say:

In this connection we refer to the White League mentioned in the message of the President. In the last campaign of Louisiana the opposition was composed of various elements—democrats, reformers, dissatisfied republicans, liberal republicans, old whigs; and in order to induce the co-operation of all, some of whom refused to unite with an organization called democratic, they took the name of "the people's party;" called in some localities "the conservative party;" in others, "the white man's party;" in others, "the White League;" and had ordinary political clubs under these names throughout the rural districts, which were ordinary political clubs and nothing more; neither secret, nor armed, nor otherwise different from usual political organizations. These must not, however, be confounded from similarity of name with the White League of the city of New Orleans.

That league—

Not of outlaws; not of Ku-Klux; not of murderers, as republican Senators have designated them. No, sir—

That league is an organization composed of different clubs, numbering in all between twenty-five and twenty-eight hundred, the members of which have provided arms for themselves, and with or without arms engage in military drill. They have no uniforms, and the arms are the property of the individuals, not of the organization. They comprise a large number of reputable citizens and property-holders in the city of New Orleans.

Men of character, men of virtue—not "banditti!"

Their purpose they declare to be simply protective; a necessity occasioned by the existence of leagues among the blacks; by the hostility with which the Kellogg government arrayed the black against the white race; and by the want of security to peaceable citizens and their families, which existed for those reasons, and because also of the peculiar formation of the police brigade.

On the other hand, the republicans assert that this is an armed body of volunteers existing for the purpose of intimidating the blacks and overthrowing the Kellogg government. That it had any considerable relations outside the city of New Orleans, or that it was intended in any way to interfere with the rights of the colored citizens, did not appear; nor, on the other hand, did it appear that there was any extensive secret league among the blacks of any kind.

Here, then, is an official contradiction of the charges that the White Leagues were Ku-Klux or banditti. Here is an official refutation of the charges constantly rung in our ears that the object and intention of the White League was to interfere with the rights of the colored people. If such intention had existed, it would have been made as clear as sunlight; if the base men who originated the charge cannot prove it, it falls to the ground Yet how many thousand men in New England, New York, and Pennsylvania believe that the White League was organized to oppress the blacks?

But it is charged, that the White League was organized to overturn the government of Kellogg, and that in their effort to do so on the 14th of September, 1874, they shed the blood of loyal men. I deny that the White League sought revolution on the 14th of September, 1874, or that they are responsible for the shedding of any blood. They sought the accomplishment of no illegal object upon that day. They had purchased arms in New York for the defense of their homes and their firesides. They turned out in a body to go quietly and peaceably to the vessel which contained them. It was a constitutional right which Kellogg and his police had no right to interfere with. Had Governor Kellogg allowed them to receive their arms there would have been no bloodshed. But Kellogg's police attempted to resist by military force the right of the White League to possess the arms which they had purchased and which had arrived and were on shipboard. What authority had this usurper to prevent this organization from purchasing arms or possessing them? His police were the aggressors. Force on his part was repelled by force on the part of the League, and a clash of arms upon the wharf was the result, with the loss of several killed and wounded. Kellogg and his police fled, abandoned the executive offices, and Penn and his associates took possession of them without a struggle.

How does this statement compare with all the exaggerated and rhetorical denunciations uttered by republican Senators against the White League for the blood, shed in overturning the Kellogg government? That government overturned itself. Kellogg knew he was put into the office and kept in it by Federal bayonets. He knew that the report of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections solemnly declared, that there was no valid government in Louisiana, that he was not elected governor. Kellogg, aware of this, at the first clash of arms fled. Was it wonderful that he did so? A master of human passion has said—

'Tis conscience that makes cowards of us all.

But when the President, to whom Kellogg and his legislature bow, with the reverential and submissive obedience with which a Mohammedan bows to the sultan, as the author and upholder of their existing government, determined to interfere, Penn quietly acquiesced and quietly surrendered. What then becomes of all this bloody revolution of the 14th September, 1874? In support of what I have said I again quote from the report of Messrs. FOSTER, PHELPS, and POTTER, who, after stating that they do not doubt that the White League would readily co-operate in any feasible scheme for overthrowing the Kellogg government, proceed to say:

The affair of the 14th of September is an illustration of this. The members of the White League had purchased arms; the police had seized these arms without process of law, taking them forcibly from the merchants who had sold and from the members who had bought them. A consignment of arms was to arrive by the steamer Mississippi. The League were called out on the morning of the 14th to go and take them in a body; the police undertook to seize the arms; the two bodies came into collision on the wharf, with the loss of several killed and wounded. There were then hardly any Federal troops in New Orleans, and the disintegration of the Kellogg party was such that before night Penn and his associates had only to take possession of the executive offices without a struggle. The movement was everywhere quietly accepted by the whites throughout the State until the Federal Government intervened, when Penn and his associates at once surrendered.

And how would the White Leagues seek to overturn Kellogg's government? Certainly by no violence. They would not resist the Federal Government. They have shown that by a peaceable surrender in September last. They would no doubt rejoice to see Kellogg's government supplanted by some valid constitutional government; so would a large majority of the people of Louisiana. Why? Because they know and the world knows that the President of the United States allowed Kellogg to be put into the executive chair by force; that he is kept there by force; and that too in the face of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Senate, that Kellogg was not elected, but that his pretended title to the executive office, so far as a vote of the people of Louisiana was concerned, was a sham, a fraud, and a cheat. If there was any governor elected in 1872 it was McEnery. If he was not elected, then there was no valid government in that State at that time or since.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] tells us that McEnery's was a paper government. So must every legal government become a paper government, however rightful, if usurpers like Durell and Kellogg, backed by Federal bayonets, determine to subvert it, and they are supported in their revolutionary course by the President, backed by the Army of the United States! Is it wonderful then that the people of Louisiana wish to be rid of Kellogg? What northern or eastern State could have been subjected to such an iron rule of usurpation and wrong as that in Louisiana without resistance? And for what purpose is this humiliating spectacle, this mockery of self-government enacted? For party supremacy—for republican success in Louisiana! It may become expedient for the Eastern, Northern, Middle, and Western States to consider the misrule and disorders of the Southern States from a political economical stand-point and apply the remedy.

Mr. William E. Dodge, an old and eminent merchant of New York, a leading republican and a vice-president, I believe, of the Union League, said at the great meeting at Cooper Institute over which Mr. Bryant presided:

We have tried this long enough; now let the South alone; let them work out their own problems, understanding that only in case of oppression or insurrection which the State cannot control let the General Government interfere. * * * As merchants, we want to see the South gain her normal position in the commerce of the country; nor can we hope for a general revival of business while things remain as they now are.

These are wise words and fitly spoken. They come from a prominent merchant of large experience. They challenge the most serious and thoughtful consideration of the entire country.

In tracing the causes of the great prostration in every branch of trade and every pursuit of industry, under which the country has so severely suffered and from which it has not yet recovered, due attention, I fear, has not been given to the existing status of the cotton, sugar, and rice producing States. It may not be unprofitable to look back at the reconstruction policy of the republican party, in order to appreciate its results after six years of sad and costly experience. In 1868 the debts of the nine States of Arkansas, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Texas aggregated in round numbers $50,000,000. In 1871, under carpet-bag rule, their indebtedness aggregated $218,000,000. In other words, the enormous sum of $168,000,000 had been added to the indebtedness of these communities in three short years without anything of material value to show for it. A large portion of this money was absolutely stolen. A part of it was issued for railroads never built and another part was squandered. This increased burden was saddled upon the backs of States just emerging from a terrible civil war, utterly crushed, with poverty and ruin staring them in the face and deprived of labor upon which the cultivation of their lands was almost entirely dependent. The increased cost of carrying on their State governments was enormously increased. Their aggregate taxation, which in 1860 was about $11,217,000, rose in 1870 to $26,020,000. While the assessed valuation of the property of these States in 1860 reached $3,294,241, it declined in 1870 to $1,404,487.

The cost of producing cotton, sugar, and rice has greatly increased under the changed condition of labor; but that could be borne and would soon settle itself by natural laws if there was peace, good government, and good-will between the sections. While alien and oppressive governments eat up the substance of the people by galling taxation, with a reduction of values on the property of these States at the same time; while mischievous and usurping partisans seek to pander to the ignorance and superstition of the colored people, hoping to excite strife and collision between the races, is it unnatural that poverty and discontent are the inevitable heir-looms of such abominable misrule? As a natural sequence to the disturbed condition of the South, northern merchants, eastern manufacturers, western farmers and stock-raisers have lost their most profitable market at home without the ability to replace it abroad. Nine millions of consumers, who if let alone would be happy and prosperous, are impoverished, without the ability to buy what they absolutely need.

Is it surprising, in view of these stern facts, that a financial crash did at last come, ruthlessly sweeping everything before it? That depression of industries still continues? The interests of all the States are too closely interwoven to be separated at a crisis like this. A striking analogy (said a great American statesman) exists between the great system of the universe and the confederation of the separate American States—independent yet connected; revolving in separate spheres, yet mutually bound one with another by a chain of common dependence; an injury to one, sensibly affecting the whole; realizing what the poet says:

Whatever link you strike,
Tenth and tenth thousandth breaks the chain alike.

There can be and will be no real and permanent prosperity until all the States are restored with their equality and with all their constitutional rights to the Union. Our national necessities demand that each State must contribute its quota to the common weal and bear its just part of the common burdens, and the prosperity of each separate State demands that self-government be restored and the military be subordinated to the civil authority. To cure the patient you must carefully and correctly diagnosticate the disease. When ascertained apply the remedy. The crushing weight of military oppression and of sordid carpet-bag rule has been removed in Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and Texas. Already the signs of growing prosperity gild the political horizon in each of those States. But poor Louisiana, the richest of them all, lies bleeding and oppressed under the leaden weight of arbitrary power and lawless misrule. Withdraw your Army and make Louisiana free!

Senators, if you could but place yourself in the position of these brave, gallant, and downtrodden people, in despite of party zeal and party fealty, your hearts would be moved to a sense of the wrongs, injustice, and trials under which they now suffer

Will you not look to the testimony officially communicated to Congress by the committee of the House of Representatives charged with the duty of investigating the condition of affairs in Louisiana, to show the infamous oppression of its people? They say:

With this conviction is a general want of confidence in the integrity of the existing State and local officials; a want of confidence equally in their purposes, and in their personnel, which is accompanied by the paralyzation of business and destruction of values. The most hopeful witness produced by the Kellogg party, while he declared that business was in a sounder condition than ever before, because there was less credit, has since declared that "there was no prosperity." The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25; of the city of New Orleans, from 80 or 90 to 30 or 40, while the fall in bank shares, railway shares, city and other corporate companies, have, in a degree, corresponded. Throughout the rural districts of the State the negroes, reared in habits of reliance upon their masters for support, and in a community in which the members are always ready to divide the necessaries of life with each other, not regarding such action as very evil, and having immunity from punishment from the nature of the local officials, had come to filching and stealing fruit, vegetables, and poultry, so generally—as Bishop Wilmarth stated without contradiction from any source—that the raising of these articles had to be entirely abandoned, to the great distress of the white people, while within the parishes, as well as in New Orleans, the taxation had been carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission for the amount assessed, and houses and stores are to be had there for the taxes. In Natchitoches, the taxation reached about 8 per cent. of the assessed value on the property. In many parishes all the white republicans and all the office-holders belong to a single family. There are five of the Greens in office in Lincoln; there are seven of the Boults in office in Natchitoches. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish—as they grew poor, while officials grew rich—they became naturally sore. That they love their rulers cannot be pretended.

Love such rulers? How could they? Congress knows, the world knows, and the people of Louisiana realize and feel that the Kellogg government was the creation of fraud, force, and usurpation. The President's recognition of it does not change that fact. It cannot be denied, so long as truth exists, that Federal power brought it into existence and that Federal soldiers sustain it. Withdraw the military to-morrow and Kellogg's usurped government goes down. It was so in 1872; it is so now. The people of Louisiana know it to be illegal, oppressive, and corrupt. When the freemen of Louisiana love such rulers as Kellogg & Co. they become unworthy descendants of their revolutionary sires.

But why shall the Senate by its action continue in any State the political and social condition of affairs described in that report? Are you deaf to the official recommendations of your own party friends?

I read from a report of Colonel Morrow, an officer of the United States Army, now in service in Louisiana, well and favorably known to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] a personal and political friend of the President, as to the wrongs, outrages, and corruptions of this Kellogg government.

He says:

Another subject of complaint was the fact that citizens are arrested without the shadow of a cause, and after a long and vexatious delay and great expense, are set at liberty without affording them even a preliminary trial. And another subject of bitter complaint, especially in Coushatta, is the fact that there is not a United States commissioner in the parish, and persons arrested are required to be sent to the city of New Orleans, several hundred miles distant, for even an examination. The expense of getting witnesses to so distant a point will make even justice a luxury that only the rich can procure. A man of moderate means could not hope to prove his innocence if the presence of many witnesses was required for the purpose. The people of Coushatta complain also, and I think justly, that a person had been sent there last fall as commissioner who was a brother to one and brother-in-law to another of one of the unfortunate men who were so brutally and dastardly murdered in August last. However brutal may have been the circumstances attending the massacre of these men, it will be at once conceded by every man at all familiar with rules in American and English courts that a near relative of the person murdered is not a proper person to sit as judge in even a preliminary hearing. These were complaints made to me against United States officials, and I therefore report them for the information of the department commander. The complaints against the State officers were so numerous that a mere enumeration of them would fill a volume. Corruption and jobbing in office; partiality and favoritism in the administration of justice; exorbitant taxes, rising in some instances to 7 and 8 per cent. on the appraised value of the property; a ruined credit; a depleted State and parish treasury; enormous debts, State and parish, and multiplication of officers in the persons of favored individuals, are a few of the charges made by the people against their State authorities.

No valid reason has been assigned by Senators on the other side for the President's recognition of the Kellogg government, in view of the fact that his party friends in the Senate had after a thorough investigation of the facts decided that Kellogg was not elected. Admit his power to do so, but let that recognition have no weight upon the Senate if the proof shows that Kellogg was never in fact elected governor of Louisiana. What excuse does the President offer for his persistent determination to uphold the returning board in their fraudulent action in nullifying the election in 1874?

Messrs. FOSTER, PHELPS, and POTTER, in their official report made after Sheridan's telegrams and after the 4th of January, 1875, say:

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board on the whole was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house.

These same gentlemen utterly dissipate the charge of general intimidation of colored voters. Upon the contrary, they say that such intimidation as did exist in Louisiana was rather in the interest of republicans than of the conservatives. Why, then, does the President not withdraw his troops? Why will he let the United States Army be made an instrument in defeating the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls on the 3d of November, 1874? Why will he sanction the conduct of a returning board which Messrs. FOSTER, PHELPS, and POTTER officially tell him "was arbitrary, unjust, and in their opinion illegal?"

I shall not impugn the motives of the President. The questions are far too grave for party bitterness or party invective.

I have spoken with the freedom of an American Senator, I have raised my humble voice against the utter annihilation of self-government in a State by the military power. Louisiana may be forced to submit by force, but her cause is the cause of every State in this Union. The President will hereafter understand this.

I have tired the Senate, and I fear wearied its patience for several hours, by my dry and oftentimes desultory commentary upon this much discussed threadbare subject.

In conclusion and by way of summary I insist—

First. That Kellogg was never legally elected governor of Louisiana.

Second. That the legislature known as the Kellogg legislature was never chosen by a majority of the people of Louisiana under the laws and constitution of that State.

Third. That John McEnery was by the returns of the vote in 1872 chosen governor and should have been recognized as such.

Fourth. That Warmoth was never legally impeached by the Legislature of Louisiana under its laws and constitution, and Pinchback was never legally the acting governor of Louisiana.

Fifth. That the whole Kellogg government was the creation of judicial usurpation, supported by the Federal military power of the United States without shadow of constitutional authority.

Sixth. That P. B. S. Pinchback was never elected Senator by any legal Legislature of Louisiana.

Seventh. That the credentials presented by him, of his election in 1873, are not signed by any legally-elected governor of Louisiana.

Eighth. That said credentials entitle Pinchback to no prima facie title, because the Senate of the United States had, before their presentation, fully determined by its Committee on Privileges and Elections, composed exclusively of republican Senators, that there was no valid government in Louisiana at the time of said election, and that this report repelled every presumption arising upon the face of his credentials of his election as Senator.

Ninth. That, the recognition by the President of Kellogg as governor does not deprive the Senate of its constitutional right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members.

Tenth. That in view of the seizure of the government of Louisiana by Kellogg, through the void and fraudulent order of a Federal judge, forbidding the counting and return of the votes of the State of Louisiana for governor and members of the Legislature of Louisiana, it is an abuse too seriously threatening free government ever to find any support as a precedent in the Senate of the United States.

Eleventh. That the Senate of the United States should not by any act, either on a prima facie title or upon the merits, seat any Senator when its doing so would legalize a precedent of such gross and oppressive usurpation as to threaten self-government and liberty in all the States.

Twelfth. Because since the election in 1873 Pinchback has been re-elected by another separate and distinct reputed Legislature, thereby recognizing the invalidity of the first election.

Thirteenth. Because the last Legislature of Lousiana, elected fairly by the people in 1874, was again nullified by the frauds of the returning board, and absolutely subverted by the military forces of the United States.

Fourteenth. Because the last Legislature from which Pinchback claimed his credentials was illegal, and was never elected by the people.

Fifteenth. Because Pinchback himself was a leading and moving spirit in all these usurpations, and has no title, legal or equitable, to a seat in this body.

Senators, these are grave and important questions, involving the very essence of free representative government. It is impossible that two Legislatures of a State can be legitimate at one and the same time. The position of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is, that as the President had recognized Kellogg, we are bound by it. Away with this fallacy. It utterly robs the Senate of its constitutional independence to judge of the elections and qualifications and returns of its members. Let this right never be surrendered! Guard it, I pray you, against force or fraud. Never sanction the doctrine that Federal power can trample upon the suffrage of the States.

Suffrage is a delegation of power to some individual. The States guard and protect it against force and fraud. If the Federal Government can by military force break down these barriers of the ballot-box in the States, then the sovereignty and rights of the States are crushed by centralized power and liberty perishes. Sanction this principle, Senators, and no State government is safe. "Then," as Mr. Webster said in the Rhode Island case, "we have a South American liberty, supported by arms to-day and crushed by arms to-morrow." I know the force of party affiliations and party spirit. I honor the Senators who, breaking through it on this occasion, stand by the limitation of both the State and Federal Constitutions in spite of party. Rebuke every interference of the President with State governments, which the Constitution of the United States forbids. Stand by the very letter of the Constitution, which authorizes the interference of Federal power in the affairs of a State only in case of invasion and domestic insurrection.

Never, O never allow usurpers to seize by usurpation the rightful government of a State, trample upon the suffrage of a people, and when seated invoke the President to aid them by the Federal Army to maintain their usurpation.

The fact that the President is sincere does not justify you, Senators, in sanctioning the usurpation. The preservation of constitutional liberty is above any party. Edward Livingston, no mean statesman in his day, said:

The gloss of zeal for the public service is always spread over acts of oppression; and the people are sometimes made to consider that as a brilliant exertion of energy in their favor which, when viewed in its true light, would be found a fatal blow to their rights. In no government is this effect so easily produced as in a free republic. Party spirit, inseparable from its existence, aids the illusion, and a popular leader is allowed in many instances impunity, and sometimes rewarded with applause, for acts which would make a tyrant tremble on his throne.

If any inducement could add responsibility to the high obligations of Senators to discharge the whole duty on this momentous occasion, it will be found in the alarming fact that arbitrary, unlicensed power is invading other States besides Louisiana. Every violation of the sovereignty and reserved rights of a State, if not promptly rebuked, excites and invites further violations.

We see military power quietly trampling upon the sovereignty of Mississippi by the removal of a sheriff by military force.

We hear threats against the governor of Arkansas by Federal power, although the present governor was elected by seventy-five thousand majority of the popular vote. Bills are pending to abolish the writ of habeas corpus and invest the President with arbitrary power over the liberties and lives of the American people. This crisis and these extraordinary movements should excite vigilance and exact rigid adherence to the Constitution.

Direct the President to recall the troops from Louisiana, and require him to recognize A. H. Garland as governor of Arkansas. But if, bent on self-destruction, the republican party in their zeal and desire to retain power sanction misrule and usurpation in the Southern States, then I appeal to the people of the United States, without distinction of party, to stand by the Constitution as our fathers made it. If it must perish, let at least the guardians of the rights of the States and faithful believers in constitutional government never surrender the heritage to the demands of lawless power. In the language of one of your own gifted but now dead republican party leaders, I say:

If we must fall, let our last hours be stained by no weakness; if we must fall, let us stand amid the crash of the falling Republic and be buried in its ruins, so that history may take note that men lived in the middle of the nineteenth century worthy of a better fate, but chastised by God for the sins of their forefathers. Let the ruins of the Republic remain to testify to the latest generations our greatness and our heroism. And let Liberty, crownless and childless, sit upon these ruins, crying aloud in a sad wail to the nations of the world, "I nursed and brought up children and they have rebelled against me."

Security of Elections, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. H. B. SMITH,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasions of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think my republicanism will be questioned by gentlemen with many of whom I have been associated here for four years. I sympathize deeply with the friends of this bill in the objects at which they aim; but, sir, I cannot vote for it as it stands. I am sorry for it, but I cannot. The seventh section provides that the United States district courts "shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses against the provisions of this act." This is flat, explicit.

Well, now, the second section provides, "If any two or more persons shall, by force or violence, actually overthrow the existing government of any State" they shall be guilty of a felony and be punished as therein provided. This, I take it, is overt, successful treason. At least it is a crime against the State.

This bill now makes it also a crime against the United States, but the bill adds no new element to the crime. It is the old crime against the State, pure and simple, as well defined by State law, as clearly within State jurisdiction as the crime of grand larceny. You only give the same offense a new name, making it a crime against the United States. I will not deny that you may do this. I will not deny that if you did it, and stopped right there, there would be concurrent jurisdiction of the crime in the State and the United States courts. In the one court the indictment would charge the offense as committed against the State, in the other as committed against the United States.

But this bill declares that the United States court shall have "exclusive jurisdiction." You do not leave concurrent jurisdiction to the State to save itself from destruction. In the mistaken effort to help the State, you wrest from it the very means of it self-defense.

The danger to the State is great enough even where the jurisdiction is concurrent, because a Federal court might first acquire jurisdiction of the criminal, condemn and pardon him, and what would the State authorities do about it? He could not be punished or condemned twice for the same offense. But this bill does not leave to the State the poor chance of first getting jurisdiction of the criminal. On the other hand, it wipes out in large part the criminal jurisdiction of the State courts.

Now look at the fourth section. The bill provides that in case the registration officers shall "refuse full and sufficient opportunities to register," or shall refuse a certificate of registration, "as may by law be required in such State," such State officer, for violation of State law, shall be guilty of a felony, which shall be punished exclusively in the United States courts. To my feeble understanding, Mr. Speaker, such statesmanship as this is simply astounding. You leave, as it seems to me, no concurrent jurisdiction even in the State court to enforce the like provisions in the State registration laws or to inflict upon State officers the penalties imposed by State laws for these identical offenses.

So in the fifth section, at an election of a Representative in Congress, the bill makes the stealing of a ballot-box or poll-list, &c., a crime punishable exclusively in the courts of the United States. I do not question that this is within the jurisdiction of Congress; but, sir, it is also within the jurisdiction of the State Legislatures, and penal laws are, I suppose, in force in every State against such an offense.

The fatal objection lies in the language of the seventh section, making the jurisdiction of the United States courts exclusive, whereas it should have been made concurrent in both the State and the United States courts. And this should not have been left to implication by simply omitting the words to which I have objected, but the concurrent jurisdiction should have been affirmed in explicit language.

I regret that an amendment cannot now be considered, as the previous question is operating; but I earnestly protest against the passage of the bill in its present shape. With much of good in it, it shows very plainly the haste with which it has been prepared and is now about to pass. This is deeply to be regretted. The times are critical. This legislation may be momentous in its results. It ought not to be ill-prepared, ill-advised, or unconstitutional. In such an hour as this and in such a work as this a blunder is worse than a crime.

Against Executive usurpations and suspensions of Habeas Corpus.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES B. BECK,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, adages are only established upon well-ascertained facts after long experience has settled their truth. None is better established or rests on a firmer foundation than that "revolutions never go backward." After a false step has been taken or a fundamental principle overthrown, parties are driven on by an irresistible necessity to the perpetration of acts which they would have shrunk from, when the first departure was taken. The most cursory review of the events of the last eight years in our history illustrates this truth, and no measure furnishes a more forcible illustration of it than the bill now under consideration.

I venture to assert that at any time before this Congress convened, the most radical member of the House would have indignantly repelled as an insult and a slander the charge that before its close he would be found voting for such a bill as the one under consideration—a bill evidently intended to destroy what little remains of State authority in conducting their own elections and in maintaining the rights of their people under local laws; and he would have become still more indignant if he had been charged with justifying and indorsing the act of the President, whose soldiery had entered the legislative halls of one of the States of the Union in time of peace, when the courts were open and its Senators and Representatives in Congress, and had driven out at the point of the bayonet five members who had been sworn in and asserted their rights to their seats under certificates of election. It would have been a still greater insult to have even suggested that such a military order as the President sent to the Senate the other day, relative to the State of Arkansas, could have been either approved or tolerated by any man who pretended to represent a free constituency.

I have no doubt that a majority of republicans on this floor have publicly avowed within the past year that under no circumstances would they consent to the overthrow of republican institutions by the election of President Grant for a third term, in violation of all the precedents and traditions of the country. Yet to-day the mass of the republican party on this floor, with I am glad to say honorable exceptions, are excusing if not vindicating the revolutionary bill now under consideration, as well as the overthrow of the State government of Louisiana and the threatened subversion of civil liberty in Arkansas, and are cringing helplessly at the feet of the President, whose election for a third term or for life is their only hope for place or power.

Never before in the history of this country, or in any other where men claim to be free, was such abject, spiritless, not to say cowardly, submission exhibited. Never were the rights or liberties of the people sought to be bartered for such a stake. It is apparent to the country, whatever pretenses or excuses may be made here, that the majority on the other side of this Hall have been driven to their present abject position, impelled by no higher or more patriotic motives than their own personal aggrandizement and the belief that they can in no other way secure from the President the patronage which he bestows only on those who blindly and implicitly obey him. Out of over one hundred and ninety republican members on this floor nearly a hundred and thirty have been repudiated by their constituents. Of that number it is safe to say that over one hundred are to-day looking to the President after the 4th of March to provide for them out of the public Treasury. Positions ranging all along the line from collectors of internal revenue and district attorneys to foreign ministers and Cabinet officers will be claimed as the reward of services now rendered on this floor to subserve the interest or the demands of the President. Hopeless of recognition by the people, with no future except in the perpetuation of power by force, they have determined to betray every trust confided to them, and to place the rights and liberties, not only of their own constituents, but of all the people of the country at the mercy of a military dictator.

The proposition made in this bill to authorize the President to suspend the writ of habeas corpus wherever and whenever he sees fit, in the face of the indorsement by him and his Cabinet of the atrocious acts and dispatches of General Sheridan, shows a determination on the part of the radical republicans to ruin if they cannot otherwise rule. They know that in all the States that seceded, from Virginia to Texas, there is not and cannot be any republican party except such as Grant and his officials own and control. Starting with such a power in a convention of their party, however useless that power may be at the polls if the voice of the people could he heard, they have determined, if legislation can effect the purpose, to stifle all opposition to their schemes and to have the votes of these States cast for their master even if liberty has to be overthrown to accomplish it. There is a significance in the repeated clamor for violent measures made day by day in the editorial columns of the Washington Republican, the recognized organ of the President "and all of us," which culminated on Friday in the following double-leaded pronunciamento:

We repeat here what we have said before very often: The passage of the bill is required to preserve to the republican party the electoral votes of the Southern States.

Remember that if the democrats carry all the Southern States, as they will if the White League usurpation in some of them is not suppressed, it will require only fifty democratic electoral votes from the Northern States to elect a democratic President. This is a liberal estimate.

That article was doubtless inspired from the White House, and sets forth in terse, pointed language the true intent and meaning not only of the proposed legislation but of all the efforts to malign and blacken the character of the southern people through partisan committees of investigation and by bitter and malignant harangues on this floor. Fortunately for the country, we have been able to postpone it here until its passage through the Senate is an impossibility. None of its advocates have ventured to argue that it was either constitutional or had the sanction of any respectable portion of the judiciary of the country. Indeed, any respectable lawyer would only make himself ridiculous by attempting to do so. Little wonder that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] avowed his hostility to the first, second, and fourth sections of it, and that no one ever attempted to answer the objections of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] when he exposed its utter unconstitutionality the other day.

No well-informed man believes that the judicial power of the United States extends to the punishment of private citizens of a State for wrongs done or offenses committed against other private citizens of the same State, or that the United States can establish a police system to regulate the private conduct of men in their dealings with one another; all of which is proposed to be done by the bill before the House. The amendments proposed, limiting the operations of the thirteenth section to the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, and Mississippi, enabling the President to suspend the writ of habeas corpus therein when he is not allowed to do so in the other States of the Union, makes the bill only the more dangerous. Mr. Burke, in all his great struggles for human liberty, never uttered a truer or wiser thought than when he said:

There is nothing to bridle the violences of state faction but this: That whenever an act is made for the cessation of law or justice, the whole people should be universally subjected to the same suspension of their franchises. The alarm of such a proceeding would then be universal. It would operate as a "sort of call of the nation." It would become every man's immediate concern to be made sensible of the absolute necessity of this total eclipse of liberty. They would more carefully advert to every renewal, and more powerfully resist it. These great determined measures are not commonly as dangerous to freedom. They are marked by too strong lines to slide into use. * * * But the true danger is, when liberty is nibbled away for expedients, and by parts. * * * Indeed, nothing is security to any individual but the common interest of all.

Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, had occasion to examine these questions elaborately in the late case of the United States against Cruikshank and others, in the Louisiana district, in which the power of Congress, under the Constitution before it was amended, as well as under the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to it, and under the various enforcement laws passed by Congress since their adoption, was examined. Speaking of the fifteenth amendment, he said:

But while the amendment has the effect adverted to, it must be remembered that the right conferred and guaranteed is not an absolute, but a relative one. It does not confer the right to vote. That is the prerogative of the State laws. It only confers a right not to be excluded from voting by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and this is all the right that Congress can enforce. It confers upon citizens of the African race the same right to vote as white citizens possess. It makes them equal. This is the whole scope of the amendment. The powers of Congress, therefore, are confined within this scope.

He adds:

But the limitations which are prescribed by the amendment must not be lost sight of. It is not the right to vote which is guaranteed to all citizens. Congress cannot interfere with the regulation of that right by the States except to prevent by appropriate legislation any distinction as to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The State may establish any other conditions and discriminations it pleases, whether as to age, sex, property, education, or anything else. Congress, so far as the fifteenth amendment is concerned, is limited to the one subject of discrimination—on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It can regulate as to nothing else. No interference with a person's right to vote, unless made on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, is subject to congressional animadversion. There may be a conspiracy to prevent persons from voting having no reference to this discrimination. It may include whites as well as blacks, or may be confined altogether to the latter. It may have reference to the particular politics of the parties. All such conspiracies are amenable to the State laws alone. To bring them within the scope of the amendment and of the powers of Congress they must have for motive the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the party whose right is assailed.

Speaking of the thirteenth amendment, the judge says:

It cannot be doubted, therefore, that Congress had the power to make it a penal offense to conspire to deprive a person of, or to hinder him in the exercise and enjoyment of, the rights and privileges conferred by the thirteenth amendment and the laws thus passed in pursuance thereof.

But this power does not authorize Congress to pass laws for the punishment of ordinary crimes and offences against persons of the colored race or any other race. That belongs to the State government alone. All ordinary murders, robberies, assaults, thefts, and offenses whatsoever are cognizable only in the State courts, unless, indeed, the State should deny to the class of persons referred to the equal protection of the laws. Then, of course, Congress could provide remedies for their security and protection. But in ordinary cases, where the laws of the State are not obnoxious to the provisions of the amendment, the duty of Congress in the creation and punishment of offenses is limited to those offenses which aim at the deprivation of the colored citizen's enjoyment and exercise of his rights of citizenship and of equal protection of the laws because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

After an elaborate review of the legislation of Congress to enforce these various amendments, he decides that, so far as it seeks to punish by Federal authority such acts as are sought to be punished by the bill now under consideration, the acts of Congress are unconstitutional, null, and void, his opinion being expressed in these words:

If these views are correct, there can be no constitutional legislation of Congress for directly enforcing the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States by original proceedings in the courts of the United States, where the only constitutional guarantee of such privileges and immunities is that no State shall pass any law to abridge them, and where the State has passed no law adverse to them, but, on the contrary, has passed laws to sustain and enforce them.

Mr. Redfield, in reviewing this opinion, uses the following well-considered language:

It seems now to be assumed that the nation can do no wrong, or, in other words, that its functions are fully adequate to the accomplishment of all which it deems it desirable to accomplish. And many of the rash experiments at legislation which have been attempted in Congress might lead to the not unnatural expectation that in the end Congress would absorb all the important legislation of the country. At such a time so carefully studied and perspicuously indicted an opinion as the foregoing cannot fail to be greatly assuring to all who may have entertained doubts whether in the end the assumptions of the legislative department of the nation would not override and overwhelm all the other departments of the Government. There can be no question in the mind of any good lawyer who has made the limitations between State and national authority a study that the grounds upon which Mr. Justice Bradley holds the provisions of the law upon which the indictment rested in this case to be unconstitutional and a usurpation of the field of exclusive State legislation are most unquestionable. And although the distinctions which he makes in his opinion between the legislative powers of the nation and the States, as affecting the subject-matter of the prohibitory provisions of the United States Constitution, might not readily have occurred at all, we cannot doubt they are entirely sound, as far as he goes; and how much further this limitation may ultimately be carried in the same direction it is not needful here to discuss.

If that opinion and criticism had been delivered and written in reference to the bill we are now considering it could hardly have been better expressed in condemning all the principles therein contained. This bill does not even have the pretext for interfering with State authority which the previous acts of Congress have had. It reaches and seeks to punish offenses committed by white men against white men as well as those committed upon the negro race. But as I said, its object is simply to increase Federal power and authority, and thus enable the President, through his subordinates, civil and military, to control elections in all the States of the South, and by means of electoral votes so controlled to neutralize an equal number of votes that may be cast against him by the States of the North and West, where it would be unsafe for Federal bayonets or Federal officials to interfere. The course pursued by the Federal authorities in Louisiana will serve to illustrate what may be expected in all the other Southern States if this unlimited authority be placed in the hands of the President. I have selected that State because all the facts relative to the action of the Federal authorities are so well known, and have been so thoroughly canvassed in the press, before the committees of this House, and in the Senate, that there can be no mistake made in any statement of fact without prompt exposure. The course pursued in Louisiana will certainly be followed in all the other Southern States, as pretexts can either be found or created to excuse, if not to justify, the interference necessary to accomplish the ends desired. Perhaps the best way to present the case fairly is to take up in rapid review the message of the President recently sent to the Senate of the United States, and examine the truth of the facts therein contained, and the spirit which animated him when writing it. I believe I can show that many of the allegations made against the people of Louisiana, prompted of course by his Attorney-General, are either in fact not true or so colored as to pervert the truth in the interest of a band of usurpers, whose sole claim to recognition is based upon the fact that they are the servile tools of the President and his advisers, pledged only to sustain the Administration, and to put down at all hazards any attempt on the part of the people to cast their votes otherwise than in the interest of the President.

He opens his message with the following statement:

To say that lawlessness, turbulence, and bloodshed have characterized the political affairs of that State since its reorganization under the reconstruction acts is only to repeat what has become well known as a part of its unhappy history; but it may be proper here to refer to the election of 1868, by which the republican vote of the State, through fraud and violence, was reduced to a few thousands, and the bloody riots of 1866 and 1868, to show that the disorders there are not due to any recent causes or to any late action of the Federal authorities.

The inference that the President evidently intends the country to draw from the foregoing statement is that the people of Louisiana have ever since the close of the war been in a state of chronic resistance to rightful authority; that without cause and without provocation, yielding to their own devilish spirit of discontent, they have preferred lawlessness, turbulence, and bloodshed to peace, order, and good government; for it will be observed that he does not even hint that oppression, robbery, usurpation, or any other of the grievous wrongs inflicted by their rulers had either existed or had anything to do with the condition of things which he describes and asserts to be true. Why, if he desires to be fair and impartial, does he not state the undoubted and well-established truth that there has been no protection given to that people either by the State or Federal Government. He might at least have been as fair from his high place as the republican committee of this House have been in their report, and have told the country, as they have done, that in Louisiana the taxation had been carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission on the amount appraised, and houses and stores are to be had there for taxes. In Natchitoches Parish the taxation reached about 8 per cent. of the assessed value on property. In many parishes all the white republicans and all the office-holders belong to a single family. There are five of the Greens in office in Lincoln Parish, and there are seven of the Boults in office in the parish of Natchitoches. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish, as they grew poor while the officials grew rich, they became naturally sore. That they loved their rulers cannot be pretended.

Does the President think they ought? or does he think that Congress ought not to consider anything but how to add to the punishment of those who resist robbery and oppression? The President himself closed an elaborate report to his predecessor, nearly a year after the war closed, as follows:

My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the Southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require the protection of the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government not humiliating to them as citizens; and that if such a course were pointed out they would pursue it in good faith.

At the first session of the last Congress, after the President had been in office over two years, Congress appointed a joint committee, consisting of seven Senators and fourteen Representatives, whose duty it was to inquire into the condition of the late insurrectionary States, so far as regards the execution of the laws and the safety of the lives and property of the citizens of the United States, with power to visit at their discretion any portions of the South during the recess of Congress, and to report at any time, with such recommendations as they might deem expedient. I was a member of that committee. We met in Washington on the 17th of May, 1871, and appointed a sub-committee of eight to proceed at once with the investigation and report to the full committee on the 20th of September. Volumes of testimony were taken before September 20. The doors were thrown open to all who could malign or blacken the southern people—the carpet-bag government officials, Federal, State, and municipal, backed by their potent ally, the Freedmen's Bureau, did their worst, but the people refuted the charges in a large majority of instances. That flagrant wrongs were done and heinous crimes committed in various localities was proved and admitted; but the people as a whole vindicated their honor, their manhood, and their integrity under the most trying circumstances before the committee, Congress, and the country.

The following extract from the minority report of the reconstruction committee sets forth the facts relative to the condition of Louisiana, as understood by the republican members, so clearly, that I prefer to insert it here rather than rely upon any statement of my own made now:

It will be remembered that after the appointment of the sub-committee of eight, on the 19th of May, the whole committee adjourned to meet on September 20. On the 21st of September Senator Blair moved that a sub-committee be sent to the States of Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and it was rejected by a strict party vote; every democrat voting for it, and every republican against it.

Again, on the same day:

"Mr. Blair submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a sub-committee of five members be appointed to visit the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, and Virginia, and make report—Virginia having been inserted at the instance of Mr. STEVENSON.

"On the question, 'Will the committee agree to the resolution?' the yeas and nays were required, and were as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Beck, Blair, Cox, Rice, Van Trump, Voorhees, and Waddell—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckley, Chandler, Coburn, Lansing, Maynard, Poland, Pool, Pratt, Scofield, Stevenson, and Scott, (chairman)—11.

"So the question was determined in the negative.

"Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution:

"Whereas it is notorious that during the present summer there has been military interference with the citizens of Louisiana at the city of New Orleans: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the sub-committee which has been appointed to examine into the affairs of the States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee make inquiry and report upon the alleged interference by the military at New Orleans, visiting New Orleans for that purpose.

"On the question, 'Will the committee agree to the resolution?' the yeas and nays were required, and were as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Beck, Blair, Cox, Van Trump, Voorhees, and Waddell—7.

"NAYS—Messrs. Buckley, Chandler, Coburn, Lansing, Maynard, Poland, Pool, Pratt, Rice, Scofield, Stevenson, and Scott (chairman)—12.

"So the question was determined in the negative."

Although Tennessee was for some reason embraced among the States assigned to one of the sub-committees, no evidence was attempted to be taken showing any lawlessness there. It follows, therefore, that five at least of the eleven Southern States, to wit, Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, are free from even the suspicion of lawlessness on the part of their people, whatever may be the fact as to their rulers. The republican members of the committee have so decided, by their combined and repeated votes and by their refusal to hear testimony to prove the facts, when urged again and again to do so by the members of the minority. That being so, the charge so often repeated is disproved, that there are unlawful combinations of disguised men organized in all the late insurrectionary States, either to resist law, control elections, intimidate negroes, or for any purpose whatever, because in five out of the eleven States even the radical members of the committee admit no such organization exists, and that law and order prevail throughout all of them.

These five States embrace greatly more than half the territory and nearly half the population of the eleven Southern States, having, as the census shows, 4,513,648 inhabitants; and it is hard to conceive how, if political or other combinations existed for any general purpose, they should be left out, while the other six States, or any part of them, were in combination for any such general objects.

When the report of that committee was before the House for consideration on the 22d of January, 1872, I set forth these resolutions and showed how peaceful and submissive the people of Louisiana had been notwithstanding the oppressions which had been heaped upon them. Mr. Stevenson, of Ohio, a thorough republican as is well known, a member of the committee, and the avowed prosecutor of all the wrong-doers, real or imaginary, in the form of Ku-Klux or other bands, replied to me, as appears by the Globe, volume 87, page 515, as follows:

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has made a statement which I wish to notice first. He says that a motion was made in that joint committee to appoint a sub-committee to go to Louisiana; and he says that motion appears upon the record of that committee. That is true; but the gentleman forgets to state what was the business then before the committee. * * * * *

The question was whether we should pursue the investigations in those States where the Ku-Klux Klan was then raging and red-handed; whether we should pursue the investigation where blood was then flowing, or whether we should be diverted to the State of Louisiana, because during the summer there had been some irregular and improper transactions there in connection with a republican convention. The democrats on that committee, anxious no doubt to turn aside the investigation from the red track of the Ku-Klux, did vote to send a sub-committee to Louisiana, but the committee had the good judgment not to be misled by them.

I have run over these records for the purpose of denying the truth of the President's indictment against the whole people of Louisiana, and especially of the allegation that, independent of "any second causes, or of any late action of the Federal authorities," the people of that State are and have since 1866 continued to be lawless, turbulent, and bloodthirsty.

The President next proceeds in his second message to arraign the people of Louisiana for what he charges to have been a shameful conspiracy by glaring frauds and forgeries to carry the elections of 1872 against the republican party, forgetting or failing to notice that all the machinery through which fraud or forgery was possible was framed and devised by radical republicans against the will of the people of the State. He, or rather his Attorney-General, (for the whole message bears the impress of that malignant public functionary,) next defends elaborately the new infamous conduct of Judge Durell. After complaining that "these proceedings have been widely denounced as an unwarrantable interference by the Federal judiciary with the election of State officers," he tries to show that the court had jurisdiction, adding:

It may be safely asserted that if Kellogg's bill in the above-named case did not present a case for the equitable interposition of the court no such case can arise under the act.

Again the President says:

Whatever may be said or thought of those matters, it was only made known to me that process of the United States court was resisted; and as said act especially provides for the use of the Army and Navy, when necessary, to enforce judicial process arising thereunder, I considered it my duty to see that such process was executed according to the judgment of the court.

Resulting from these proceedings, through various controversies and complications, a State administration was organized with William P. Kellogg as governor, which in the discharge of my duty under section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, I have recognized as the government of the State.

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result. Kellogg obtained possession of the office, and in my opinion has more right to it than his competitor.

I propose to notice this portion of the message somewhat carefully, as this was the point at which, applying the language of that document to the true facts, "a shameful and undisguised conspiracy was formed" between the Attorney-General of the United States and the radical leaders in Louisiana to carry that election for the radical party, "without regard to law or right; and to that end the most glaring frauds and forgeries were committed," all that has followed being but the logical sequence to the outrages then committed.

If any man and any act has been condemned by the whole American people more emphatically than any other it is Judge Durell and his infamous order. I did not suppose that even the audacity of the Attorney-General would enable him to induce the President to indorse him and it as he has done. The President shows that he was aware of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, made February 20, 1873, because he refers to it for another purpose. He must have known, therefore, what that committee, composed of his own party friends, reported to the Senate relative to that order. I will read a few extracts from their report. After setting forth the order of Judge Durell they say:

It is impossible to conceive of a more irregular, illegal, and in every way inexcusable act on the part of a judge. Conceding the power of the court to make such an order, the judge, out of court, had no more authority to make it than had the marshal. It has not even the form of judicial process. It was not sealed, nor was it signed by the clerk, and had no more legal effect than an order issued by any private citizen.

They set forth his opinion in full and add:

It is somewhat remarkable that in this opinion the judge makes no allusion to the fact that the State-house was then in possession of Federal troops, under an order issued by him, out of court, the night before. The opinion materially misstates the allegations of the bill and wholly ignores the fact that under the act of November 20 the governor had appointed a new canvassing board, which had in fact canvassed the votes; of all which he was aware, because the proclamation of the governor officially promulgating these facts was embodied in the order for seizing the State-house, made by the judge the night before. The judge also declares that about four thousand affidavits sustain the averments of the bill.

Your committee have examined many of these affidavits, and it is admitted that none of them contain the statement that right of registration or right of voting was denied on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

* * * * * * * *

Viewed in any light in which your committee can consider them, the orders and injunctions made and granted by Judge Durell in this cause are most reprehensible, erroneous in point of law, and are wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and your committee must express their sorrow and humiliation that a judge of the United States should have proceeded in such flagrant disregard of his duty, and have so far overstepped the limits of Federal jurisdiction.

* * * * * * * *

But for the interference of Judge Durell in the matter of this State election, a matter wholly beyond his jurisdiction, the McEnery government would to-day have been the de facto government of the State. Judge Durell interposed the Army of the United States between the people of Louisiana and the only government which has the semblance of regularity, and the result of this has been to establish the Kellogg government, so far as that State now has any government. For the United States to interfere in a State election and by the employment of troops set up a governor and Legislature without a shadow of right, and then to refuse to redress the wrong upon the ground that to grant relief would be interfering with the rights of the State, is a proposition difficult to utter with a grave countenance.

It is hard to conceive how a more severe condemnation could have been pronounced on the acts of a judge or on the conduct of the Federal authorities in Louisiana two years ago. That report stands in strange contrast with the apologetic tone of the President's late message, in which he asserts confidently that if Kellogg's bill did not present a case for the equitable interposition of the court, no such case can arise under the act.

The Senate report, it will be observed, was signed by Senators CARPENTER, LOGAN, ANTHONY, and ALCORN. Language equally denunciatory of all these proceedings will be found in the separate views of Senators MORTON and Trumbull.

The Committee on the Judiciary of this House reported articles of impeachment against the judge, who now finds an apologist in the President, and in their report denounce his conduct in the most unmeasured terms, while Durell has confessed his guilt by resigning to escape conviction.

One of the most remarkable statements in this remarkable message is that in which he excuses the use made of the Army and Navy. He says: "It was only made known to me that process of the United States courts was resisted," and therefore the Army and Navy were used to enforce the judgment. Of course I assume that the statement of the President is true, but the assumption is fatal to his Attorney-General. He had promised Durell that he should be sustained by the whole military power of the United States long before the order was issued. He cannot plead ignorance of the law as an excuse, for he was fully advised of the nature of the proceedings and of all the outrages contemplated long before they were perpetrated. With that knowledge, in palpable violation of his known duty, plainly usurping power without pretense of rightful authority, he sent to Marshal Packard, the political manager of Kellogg's fortunes, the following dispatch several days before Durell had issued any order in the case:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General knew, if the President did not, all about the conspiracy for the overthrow of the State government of Louisiana and illegally interfered, with the troops of the United States, in advance of Durell's action. The poor, worthless judge has been made to pay the penalty; his far more guilty superior officer retains his high position and is again repeating with impunity similar outrages on that unhappy and prostrate people. Lest I be charged with exaggeration or desire to accuse the Attorney-General wrongfully, I will read an extract from the carefully prepared report of Senator Trumbull to the Senate of the United States, in which, when commenting on this dispatch, he said:

This dispatch, so far as the evidence shows, was not responsive to any call for troops. There had been no resistance to any process of the United States courts, nor does it appear that any was threatened. R. H. Jackson, a captain in the First Artillery, United States Army, testified that he went to New Orleans on the night of December 5 with two batteries of his regiment and eighty-six men.

The same night, December 5, between nine and eleven o'clock, Judge Durell, at his private lodgings, issued his order, which for want of jurisdiction was void and entitled to no respect from anybody, directing the United States marshal forthwith to take possession of the State-house, to hold the same until the further order of the court, and prevent all unlawful assemblage of persons therein, having reference to the persons returned as elected to the Legislature according to the official returns. Captain Jackson testifies that he took possession of the State-house at about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, with instructions to take and hold it under the direction of the United States marshal and to act in obedience to his orders. He further testified that he was not stationed in the State-house to prevent riots but to hold the building, and that if a riot had occurred in front of the building he would not have interfered. He posted two soldiers at the entrance door, who guarded it with crossed bayonets, and suffered no one to enter the building except by permission of the United States marshal, one of whose deputies was at all times present. These troops continued to occupy the State-house for more than six weeks, until January 21, and it is manifest, from the whole testimony, that they were not there to preserve the peace, but to carry out the illegal orders of Judge Durell, and prevent the legally elected members of the Legislature from assembling and organizing.

Can it be that the Attorney-General sent his telegram and that Captain Jackson was ordered to New Orleans with his batteries in anticipation of the unauthorized orders of United States District Judge Durell to seize the State-house and prevent the Legislature from organizing except with such persons as he should declare legally elected, or that the Attorney-General supposed it the duty of the Executive to support with the military power the decrees and mandates of United States courts issued without jurisdiction and consequently void? In no conceivable case could a United States court or judge have jurisdiction to issue orders such as were promulgated by Judge Durell. As well might a United States district judge make an order to seize the Federal Capitol and prevent all members of Congress from entering the building except such as he should declare elected. Would the President direct General Emory to furnish the troops to execute such an order? He has no more right to aid the execution of an order of court, void for want of jurisdiction, than the judge has to make it. It is his duty to discriminate between the orders of courts which may be lawful and those which must necessarily be void for want of jurisdiction. Had the troops been withdrawn when the character of the orders they were enforcing was made known, it might be inferred that the Attorney-General did not intend they should be used for such a purpose; but they held possession of the State-house for more than six weeks.

In the face of such an array of facts, it is folly for the President to expect the American people to believe that the troops of the United States were only used because the process of the United States court was resisted, which he says in his message was the only fact made known to him. He may have been kept in ignorance; his statement requires me to admit that he was, but truth requires me to assert that his attorney-general was in the conspiracy to overthrow the government of Louisiana, which fact the President now knows, and with that knowledge retains him, and continues to empower him to oppress and degrade the people of Louisiana. Kellogg wrote to Attorney-General Williams on the 27th of November, 1872, a full account of his plans, among other things saying:

I therefore respectfully suggest that General Emory, who I think appreciates the necessity and sympathizes with the republican party here, be instructed to comply with any requisition that the United States courts may make upon him in support of its mandates and to preserve the peace. As at present advised, I think General Emory understands that he is to use the troops in no contingency without instructions from Washington.

The telegram from Williams to Packard of December 2 was the prompt response to Kellogg, and Durell was used as the tool of the conspirators. The pretense of resistance to Federal authority on which the President now seeks to vindicate his action is dissipated by the telegram of Packard to Williams on December 9, in which he pronounces "all quiet," and that of Pinchback to the President of the same date, calling for further military interference, in which he says:

Be pleased to send the necessary order to General Emory. This seems to me a necessary measure of precaution, although all is quiet here.

There never was resistance to Federal authority, either executive or judicial, by the people of Louisiana, the statement of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. On the contrary, the people met and agreed to send a hundred of their best citizens to Washington with a respectful memorial to be laid before the President and the Congress of the United States, setting forth their grievances and the wrongs which had been done them. It will be found on pages 21, 22, and 23 of Executive Document No. 91, third session of Forty-second Congress. No man can read it without feeling an honest indignation against the Attorney-General, the marshal, the judge, and other Federal officials, for the part they took in the conspiracy with Kellogg, Pinchback, and their other confederates, to destroy the rights and liberties of that people. Yet not only was the petition disregarded, but the right of petition was denied in advance in language that the Czar of all the Russias would not have used ot the most abject of his Polish slaves. It stands alone in American history unparalleled for insolence and supercilious audacity. Let me read it:

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Now, the President says to Congress in his message:

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen.

Then, when the facts were fresh and the truth could be easily ascertained and the rights of this people established in accordance with it, the Attorney-General sent the insulting telegram I have just read; and he is the favored and trusted minister of the President to-day, who admitted that he closed his ears to one side and furnished his bayonets to the other while he is unable even now to say which side was right.

I might show by a more careful analysis of the events which occurred in that State in 1872 how utterly regardless the Administration at Washington was of the rights and interests of the citizens, and how thoroughly it supported and sustained the usurpers in their efforts to overthrow civil liberty and plunder an already almost bankrupt people, but I have shown enough to satisfy any fair-minded man that if the power now sought to be given to the President is vested in him it will be used to still further oppress and degrade the people of that State and to strengthen the hands of their oppressors. Who doubts, even regardless of recent events, that the President would suspend the writ of habeas corpus whenever Kellogg, Pinchback, Packard, or any of their gang asked him to do so, no matter what proof the citizens who were not the political partisans of the President might bring to show the falsity of the charges?

If any doubt remained as to the folly, not to say indecency, of vesting such a power in the President's hands, his recent conduct must have removed it. No man can read the message to which I have referred without seeing all through it a bitterness not only unworthy of the Chief Executive, but such as is rarely indulged in by the bitterest political partisan. The following relative to the late election will serve as a specimen:

Prior to, and with a view to the late election in Louisiana, white men associated themselves together in armed bodies called "White Leagues," and at the same time threats were made in the democratic journals of the State that the election should be carried against the republicans at all hazards, which very naturally greatly alarmed the colored voters. By section 8 of the act of February 28, 1871, it is made the duty of United States marshals and their deputies, at polls where votes are cast for Representatives in Congress, to keep the peace and prevent any violations of the so-called enforcement acts, and other offenses against the laws of the United States; and upon a requisition of the marshal of Louisiana, and in view of said armed organizations and other portentous circumstances, I caused detachments of troops to be stationed in various localities in the State to aid him in the performance of his official duties. That there was intimidation of republican voters at the election notwithstanding these precautions, admits of no doubt.

Again, in defending the act of his soldiers in ejecting from the Legislature members claiming seats in that body, he says:

Nobody was disturbed by the military who had a legal right at that time to occupy a seat in the Legislature. That the democratic minority of the house undertook to seize its organization by fraud and violence; that in this attempt they trampled under foot law; that they undertook to make persons not returned as elected members, so as to create a majority; that they acted under a preconcerted plan, and under false pretense introduced into the hall a body of men to support their pretensions by force, if necessary, and that conflict, disorder, and riotous proceedings followed, are facts that seem to be well established; and I am credibly informed that these violent proceedings were a part of a premeditated plan to have the house organized in this way, recognize what has been called the McEnery senate, then to depose Governor Kellogg, and so revolutionize the State government

The country might have accepted these statements as true coming from such high authority, and might have disregarded all the protests of the people of Louisiana—although they knew that Marshal Packard, under whose control the troops of the United States were placed, was the chairman of Kellogg's executive committee and had been from the beginning the principal instrument in manipulating the frauds by which he was enabled to obtain power—if this House had not undertaken to investigate the truth of the controversy relative to the elections held last fall by sending a committee of its own to Louisiana armed with full authority to inquire into all the facts. After spending many weeks in the investigation, the Select Committee on Louisiana Affairs, on the 23d day of February, 1875, submitted the following among other facts to the House:

The laws inimical to the colored people of Louisiana referred to in their report have been repealed for years. Except during the schism of Governor Warmoth, in 1872, the republican party has long had control of the machinery of the State.

* * * * * * *

First. The registration was incorrect, and exceeded the true colored vote.

The registration was wholly in the hands of the Kellogg officials, with whom a republican committee, with United States Marshal Packard at their head, co-operated.

* * * * * * *

Third. Eighteen hundred and seventy-four was a year of political change, in which the vote throughout all the States was seriously affected against the republican party; a change resulting largely from the financial distress of the people, and which should, therefore, naturally have been even greater in Louisiana than elsewhere.

Fourth. It became the interest of the conservatives, at least at the late election, not to intimidate, but to acquire, by every fair means, the colored vote.

* * * * * * *

Fifth. The entire want of any direct evidence to show any general intimidation of the colored voters.

* * * * * * *

We hold, therefore, that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

To the resolution reported to the House from the committee, as to the action of the returning board, we are all agreed.

We understand the committee to be unanimous in finding the fact that the action of the returning board has defeated the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls on the 3d of November, 1874. The people then elected to the lower house of their Legislature a majority of conservative members; a portion of the conservative members thus elected were refused their certificates. This is an act of great injustice to the individuals, of gravest danger to the State and free government, and ought to be immediately corrected by any power competent to correct it.

In view of the facts stated in that report, especially of that portion of it which asserts the entire want of any direct evidence to show any general intimidation of the colored voters, and of the assertion, after thorough examination, that the people of the State did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, it is difficult to imagine upon what authority the President asserts that there was no doubt that there was intimidation of republican voters at the election; and it is still more difficult to understand, after the committee have unanimously found that the returning board defeated the will of the people and that a majority of the conservative members were elected to the Legislature, how the President can assert that nobody was disturbed by the military who had a legal right at that time to occupy a seat in the Legislature. The tone and temper of that message shows that if power is given to him to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, he will disregard every right which ought to be held sacred, and will uphold and maintain the men who are trampling down every semblance of civil liberty there. If anything is needed to prove that there can be no mistake as to the correctness of my convictions upon that subject, the reply of the Secretary of War to the infamous suggestions contained in the telegrams of General Sheridan place it beyond all peradventure. I take from the appendix to the message the following dispatches:

[Telegram dated New Orleans, January 5, 1875. Received at N. E. corner Fourteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue 4.47 p. m.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Please say to the President that he need give himself no uneasiness about the condition of affairs here. I will preserve the peace, which it is not hard to do with the naval and military forces in and about the city; and if Congress will declare the White Leagues and other similar organizations, white or black, banditti, I will relieve it from the necessity of any special legislation for the preservation of peace and equality of rights in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and the Executive from much of the trouble heretofore had in this section of the country.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

[Telegram dated Headquarters Military Division of the Missouri, New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875. Received January 5.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 6, 1875.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

The President is hardly less emphatic in his approval of Sheridan's suggestions in his message than his Secretary was in the telegram just read. He says:

He has characterized the leaders of the White Leagues in severe terms, and suggested summary modes of procedure against them, which, though they cannot be adopted, would, if legal, soon put an end to the troubles and disorders in that State.

The meaning of which obviously is, "Give me the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and Sheridan shall have authority to dispose of the banditti; order shall reign in Warsaw, and my schemes and those of my friends shall no longer be interfered with by a disobedient rabble." Can the representatives of a free people trust with such powers men indorsing and uttering such sentiments. If they do, their constituents will see to it that other men will fill their places hereafter in these halls who will show some regard for civil liberty and right; but that is not all, nor is it, perhaps, the strongest evidence of the determination on the part of the President to exercise the powers he now seeks to acquire for the subversion of popular government. His evident designs on the State of Arkansas are still more alarming than those expressed or entertained toward Louisiana, and they are sought to be carried out for a purpose still more unjustifiable. Fortunately we have the facts relative to that State in a form so authentic that I prefer to use them rather than rely upon any statements of my own, because in grave matters of this sort nothing should be left in doubt which can be made positively certain.

On the 6th day of February last Judge POLAND, on behalf of the

Select Committee on the Condition of Affairs in the State of Arkansas, laid before the House the report of the committee, in which, after showing that Governor Baxter had been recognized as governor by the President, and had been in office for considerably more than a year, difficulties sprang up between him and Brooks as to his right, relative to which the committee submit the following facts:

On the 22d of April, 1874, Baxter telegraphed to the President as follows: "I propose to call the Legislature together at an early day, and leave them to settle the question, as they alone have the power; but to do this the members of the Legislature must have assurances of protection from you and a guarantee that they may meet in safety. This will be a peaceable solution of the difficulty, and I will readily abide by the decision of the Legislature." On the same day the President replied to Baxter as follows: "I heartily approve any adjustment peaceably of the pending difficulties in Arkansas by means of the Legislative Assembly, the courts, or otherwise. I will give all the assistance and protection I can under the Constitution and laws of the United States to such modes of adjustment. I hope that the military on both sides will now be disbanded." On the 24th of April, Baxter replied as follows: "In accordance with my correspondence with you by telegraph, I have convened the Legislature for the 11th May. I have sent home part of my forces, and would willingly send the balance, except a small body-guard, but Brooks retains his whole force and receives re-enforcements. All the people desire is that peace be restored, and the Legislature prompted in the performance of their legitimate business."

Touching the new constitution and the election of officers under it, and of the present condition of the State, the committee, among other things, say:

There was no evidence before us but that the elections both of the 30th of June, on calling the convention, and of the 13th of October, were quiet and peaceable; no act of violence was shown or claimed to have been committed at either.

Your committee are of opinion that the constitution received not only a majority of the legal votes cast, but that it received a majority of the legal votes in the State.

A. H. Garland, who was nominated for governor by the democrats, and voted for at same election, received, as returned by the State board of supervisors, 76,453 votes. The other candidates on the same ticket received nearly the same number.

On the 11th of November, 1874, the Legislature elected on the 13th of October assembled, and Mr. Garland was duly inaugurated as governor, and all the State, circuit, county, and township officers chosen at the same election entered upon their duties. No person holding office under the old constitution made any active or open opposition to this change, and it was all accomplished in a peaceable manner.

The new constitution we regard as republican in form, and in many respects an improvement upon that of 1868. Some question has been made as to the dropping from the declaration of principles some of the professions of loyalty contained in the old constitution. Most of the reconstruction constitutions contained rather a surplusage on that subject. We think the substance has been retained.

The committee are satisfied that the convention to frame the constitution, and the constitution itself, were voted for, and are satisfactory to the majority of the voters and people of the State. The State officers were certainly elected by a majority of votes cast, and we think by a majority of the votes in the State. The condition of the State has been as peaceful since the new government was inaugurated as it ever has been; acts of violence have been very few indeed. It is alleged that this is all because they are now under congressional investigation, and on their "good behavior."

* * * * * * *

Your committee will take no time to give their views of the true relations and duties of the general and State governments. Questions of great delicacy arise in dealing with them. The people of every State have the right to make their own constitution to suit themselves, provided it be republican in form and in harmony with the Constitution of the United States, and the National Government has not authority to deprive them of that right. Here we have the case of a State having a constitution republican in form, adopted and ratified by a large majority of its people, manned by officers of their choice, and going forward with reasonable quiet and peace. Your committee cannot find any solid ground on which to stand to say the General Government can or ought to interfere; and no amount of irregularity in the processes by which this state of things was brought about furnishes just reason for doing so.

The very next day after that report was made public the President, as if in menace and defiance of the committee and the House, sent to the Senate the following "order" in the form of a message:

To the Senate of the United States:

Herewith I have the honor to send, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, all the information in my possession not heretofore furnished relating to affairs in the State of Arkansas.

I will venture to express the opinion that all the testimony shows that in the election of 1872 Joseph Brooks was lawfully elected governor of that State; that he has been unlawfully deprived of the possession of his office since that time; that in 1874 the constitution of the State was by violence, intimidation, and revolutionary proceedings overthrown, and a new constitution adopted and a new State government established.

These proceedings, if permitted to stand, practically ignore all rights of minorities in all the States. Also, what is there to prevent each of the States recently readmitted to Federal relations on certain conditions, changing their constitutions and violating their pledges, if this action in Arkansas is acquiesced in?

I respectfully submit whether a precedent so dangerous to the stability of State government, if not of the National Government also, should be recognized by Congress. I earnestly ask that Congress will take definite action in this matter to relieve the Executive from acting upon questions which should be decided by the legislative branch of the Government.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1875.

The country will readily understand from these documents I have read not only why the President and his retainers want the writ of habeas corpus suspended, but how the power will be used if it is granted.

The State government of Arkansas will be subverted; Brooks will be installed by Federal bayonets as governor over that province; five or six million dollars which Baxter managed to save from the plunderers of that people will at once be issued and squandered as the bonds before issued have been; indeed, that is the object which the political managers have in seeking to destroy the rights and liberties of that people

Preferring to cite republican authority against the claim of the President rather than to rely on any weight my own views might have, I refer to the elaborate report made by Senator MORTON on Louisiana affairs two years ago as a complete refutation of any pretended right of the President to interfere in the affairs of Arkansas. The force of the views of the Senator will be readily gathered by reading the following extracts:

The theory of our system is that every State government possesses the power and machinery to correct the wrongs and frauds within itself practised under color of or in open violation of its own laws, and that the decision of its own tribunals, created by its constitution and laws for such purpose, must be received as final. When the constitution of a State provides that each house of its Legislature shall be the judge of its election and qualification of its members, full faith and credit must be given to their action; and should the Government of the United States go behind their action to inquire whether the members have been lawfully elected to the Legislature, their independence would be wholly destroyed and the validity of their action made to depend upon the will of Congress.

It is no answer to this to say that, in a particular case, such tribunals will or have decided wrongfully. The Government of the United States has no right to review their decisions so long as the State possesses a government republican in its form

* * * * * * *

The power and duty conferred upon the United States by the fourth article to guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of Government is political in its character, and not subject to revision by the judiciary; but when, upon inquiry, it is ascertained that a State has an existing government in active operation, which is not obstructed by violence, in which each department is mutually recognized by the other, and which is republican in its form, there is no foundation for the interference of Congress, and no condition to which its power can attach; and although its officers may have been elected by fraud or installed without election, yet all questions in relation to them must necessarily arise under the constitution and laws of the State, and under the decision in Luther vs. Borden be referred for determination to the tribunal of the State.

* * * * * * *

Where, by the constitution and laws of a State, legal remedies are provided for the redress of all wrongs that may take place in regard to elections, it would be inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the State governments for the United States to interfere and assume jurisdiction upon the ground that the State tribunals have acted wrongfully and fraudulently, or will so act. The Government of the United States is not a Don Quixote, going forth to hunt up and redress all the wrongs that may be inflicted upon the people in any part of the country, but is a Government limited and restrained in its jurisdiction by the charter of its creation, and that charter distinctly recognizes the existence of State governments to be constituted legally by the States themselves, subject only to the provision of the higher law that they shall be republican in form.

* * * * * * *

This great power to guarantee to each State a republican form of government is intended only for the highest and most solemn occasions. If it is invoked for every disorder in a State, it must result in the absorption of the State governments and subvert the whole theory and plan of our political institutions. While we are a nation in which alone the sovereignty resides, yet local self-governments which preceded the Constitution, and are recognized and continued by it as a part of the great plan of political salvation, are indispensable to our liberty, progress, and happiness, and must be preserved. It should be exercised only upon well-defined principles, in cases coming clearly within their limits, and with all the more caution because it is political in its character, and the use or abuse of it cannot be reviewed by the courts.

* * * * * * *

Should Congress declare that Louisiana has no legal State government and provide by law for a new election, it would establish a precedent for overturning State governments and setting up new ones, under which the government of every State would be at the mercy of Congress as controlled by the passions or exigency of parties.

Deploring this condition of things in Louisiana, and earnestly hoping that the people will take warning and with one accord insist upon honest elections and the faithful observance of the laws, it is my deliberate judgment that it is better for them to bear the ills they have and seek reformation and relief under their own laws and tribunals than to invoke the National Government to the assertion of a power under which State governments would exist hereafter only by sufferance.

I indorse these views and believe they will be indorsed by the country, even if the President and his followers should be desperate enough no disregard them.

I do not believe there is power enough or influence enough or respect enough left with or felt for the repudiated majority of this Congress to convince any respectable number of the people of the country that they are actuated in their desperate schemes by any desire to promote the welfare either of the negro race or of the so-called loyal men of the South, or that they have any other or higher ambition in the proposed legislation than to ingratiate themselves in the favor of the President for the purpose of extracting favors from him as a reward for their servility to him.

Security of Elections.

SPEECH OF HON. W. J. O'BRIEN,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1875.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections—

Mr. O'BRIEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not the time allowed me, nor in fact have I the disposition, to enter upon a discussion of the merits of the bill now before the House. I propose to characterize it as the hour demands, and not to waste words in a fruitless attempt to convince gentlemen on the other side that this measure is the most wanton attempt to destroy the freedom of elections and to create a dictatorship amid the ruins of free government that the republican party and administration have ever disclosed. The day of your departure from power is the opportunity seized upon, not to restore civil liberty to the people but to ruin and destroy the vestiges of constitutional government which have up to this time escaped your malignity and fury. You have by the enactment of the civil-rights bill attempted to renew the discord and troubles which through your laws have brought desolation to nearly every hearth-stone in the South. After destroying their prosperity, confiscating their property by tax levies, and inflicting upon them the odious misrule of the ignorant negro and the crafty, thieving adventurer, you now propose by this bill to revive the horrors of despotic rule, and it may be to enable another Nero to fiddle while the whole country is burning. Why not erect a Coliseum in this capital and let loose beasts of prey upon your victims? It would be mercy; for under the operation of this measure, if it becomes law, every United States court-house in the South will be turned into an amphitheater, where your marshals, your spies, informers, and adventurers will gorge themselves with the blood of the men of the South, and your Bonds and Durells will re-enact the rôle of the infamous Jeffreys.

You boast, Mr. Speaker, that this is an enlightened age; that the nineteenth century sheds its luster around us; that we possess the best government on earth. Vain delusion. This bill will throttle civil liberty where for nearly a hundred years it has had its noblest exemplification. The writ of habeas corpus, which obtained as the privilege of a free people only after a struggle of centuries, is about to be yielded to the demand of an administration which, having lost the confidence of the people, seeks to regain its waning influence by the establishment of a despotism unknown to the annals of civilization. In words, Mr. Speaker, that speak the object of this infamous measure and prove the motives of this conspiracy against free government by its originators, I assert that it is a design to re-elect Grant for a third term, and by force and fraud, at the risk of revolution and the expense of the Constitution, to retain the power and control of the Government in the republican party. The question of the success or failure of this conspiracy depends upon the action of this Congress. The people and the press have, I trust, foreshadowed its doom. They have with singular unanimity denominated this measure as "the force bill," and in that epithet have uttered their condemnation. But the question remains with the Representatives of the people, in the few hours remaining to this Congress, whether by our action we will further manacle our brothers of the South by iniquitous laws, or by a defeat of this bill reassert their right to equal citizenship under the protection of just and humane government.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] and other gentlemen who have addressed the House in favor of this bill defend it as a measure of retaliation for pretended wrongs inflicted on the negro by the white men of the South. The republican party originated on the issue of the negro question, and was mainly propagated by inflamed stories of oppression under the institution of slavery, In behalf of the freedom of the negro an aggressive war was waged, resulting in their recognition as citizens and the establishment of governments in the Southern States based upon the principles of ignorance and corruption. After ten years of negro domination, abetted by malignant adventurers maintained in power by Federal bayonets, during which the white race have been impoverished and degraded, there appears a hope of the restoration of pure government, wielded by the intelligent and upright men of the Southern States, and now the power of the republican party and the Government is invoked to crush out their aspirations, and to reduce them again to a tenfold worse state of slavery and subjection.

The statement is made and reiterated that throughout the South inhuman outrages are perpetrated, that murder and assassination are rife, and that school-houses and churches are burned. These charges are made against white citizens, and the negroes and their carpet-bag allies are held up as patterns of propriety and virtue. Let us inquire, Mr. Speaker, of the facts, and ascertain how far these and kindred charges are sustained. From the evidence and reports of the committees that investigated the affairs of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Alabama every fair-minded man can draw his own conclusion, and I hazard nothing in the assertion that his judgment will accord with the sentiment of the country, which has scorned and condemned all such charges as the emanation of the outrage-mills of the political parasites whose day will soon be past, I trust, forever.

Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the present session I had the honor to be appointed by you on the Committee to Investigate the Affairs of the State of Mississippi. In December last the country was startled by telegrams from Vicksburgh which told of an armed collision between the whites and negroes, in which two hundred persons, mostly negroes, were slain. The press of the country circulated reports of the affair, in some instances blinded by party prejudice terming it a massacre. Article after article was published, in which the white citizens of Mississippi were denounced as a band of assassins; white-leaguers, masked and armed, flitted before the eyes of the political editors, and these valiant heroes, with pen in hand, rushed into the conflict with the white-line phantoms of their imagination, only resting from their labors when by a call from Governor Ames, of Mississippi, they were assured that the President would respond by a prostitution of his authority in the use of the Army of the United States. The Representative [Mr. MCKEE] from that part of Mississippi in which the armed conflict took place, animated no doubt by the noble impulses and the high and honorable instincts which in common with his negro constituency he evinces, arose in his place and offered the resolutions which led to the appointment of the committee of investigation. That committee proceeded to Mississippi, and after three weeks returned to Washington and placed before the House the printed testimony and the majority and minority reports which are now on your table.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to compare the reports with the testimony in regard to their most important statements and to leave the country to judge of the justice or injustice of our respective conclusions.

The republican members of the committee have presented a report, prepared by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] in which the gravest charges are made against the white people of Mississippi. This report deliberately asserts that political organizations exist in that State which are an extension of the "White League organizations of New Orleans," and that they are controlled by interior military organizations for special and unlawful purposes. Why, sir, there is not a shadow of testimony to support this statement; on the contrary, the evidence is conclusive to the point that the organizations in Mississippi of a political character are in no wise different in their objects from the political clubs to be found in every northern State.

In order that I may do no injustice to my honorable colleagues of the committee, I will read portions of their report and of the minority report which I had the honor to submit in behalf of my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] and myself, and also extracts from the testimony in reference to these points.

The majority report states that tax-payers' leagues were formed, but does not find that they were in any sense objectionable, and then adds:

THE "WHITE LINE."

But early in the year 1874 another organization begins to make its appearance, narrower in its proportions, illegal in its views, and basing itself upon the embodiment of force and the readiness to use violence for the purpose of controlling and overthrowing the will of the majority, lawfully expressed in the form of elections.

This interior organization has not yet assumed definitely, in the State of Mississippi, such precise form and so distinct an existence as in the State of Louisiana, but is unquestionably an extension into Mississippi of the "White League" organization, whose headquarters are in New Orleans. In Warren County it is sometimes called the "white line," and by that name is familiarly spoken of by the leading papers of Vicksburgh, as well as by some of the prominent witnesses before this committee. It is also known as "people's clubs," but in all instances the formation of the clubs or civil organization is accompanied by establishing within the clubs themselves a military organization, officered, equipped, and armed.

Thus the clubs and the tax-payers' league are open associations, apparently directed toward objects in which all citizens might lawfully unite, but controlled from within by the military and partisan organizations whose purposes are special and unlawful.

The purposes of these clubs or white-line companies are these, as they are openly avowed or secretly cherished:

First. They are first to make a census and enrollment of all the white men in the State.

Second. To incorporate into the interior military organizations all the whites who will join with them.

Third. To set aside, by whatever means may be necessary, the election of colored men to office, and to nullify in practice the enabling and enforcement acts of Congress, granting and enforcing the right of all citizens, without distinction of color, to hold offices, if properly elected to them.

Fourth. To allow none but white men to be elected to office or to hold office.

In relation to the same subject the report states:

COERCING THE NEGRO VOTE.

They are as yet willing that colored men shall vote, but always under the proviso that they vote for and with white men.

In those States where the colored vote is in the majority there are many white men, and those of high character and position, who openly avow that that colored majority must be and shall be controlled and overridden. This declaration means force and intimidation and means nothing else, for no persuasion, no inducement, no eloquence, no fair promises have been wanting in the past to induce or bribe the colored people to abandon their attachment to the political party which liberated them and gave them these rights. All have failed, for it is unquestionably the settled belief of the black men of the South that outside of the republican party they have no protection from lapsing into slavery.

Nothing is left but force and intimidation to bring about this result desired at the South; and that result is so precious to them that any means seem lawful and expedient.

The minority report, in referring to the municipal election in Vicksburgh, held in August, 1874, states that efforts had been made to register every man entitled to vote, and alludes to the political clubs as follows:

To secure this end political clubs of white men had been organized in the city, and through their exertions nearly every voter was enrolled and brought forward for registration. Many white men who had declined since the war to participate in politics were induced to register, on the ground that the deplorable condition of municipal affairs imperatively demanded that every citizen should give the aid of his vote to secure the election of honest and capable officers.

The minority report recites the following general conclusions from a review of the testimony:

The effect of the reconstruction acts and the recent amendments to the Constitution was to give the State legislation and all the offices—State, county, and municipal—over to the enfranchised colored men and their white leaders, many of whom were of the class known as political adventurers.

A few of their leaders were intelligent and honest men, who counseled their followers to cultivate friendly relations with their former masters and the white people generally. For a time they succeeded; in proof of which it may be cited that a clause of the constitution disfranchising the whites was defeated mainly by the votes of colored men. This constitution had been adopted by a convention composed in large part of the element denominated carpet-baggers, and their action in this regard is a fair example of the venom that inspired much of their legislation. The colored population, by the counsel and misrepresentation of these men, who had no interest in the peace and prosperity of the State, became entirely estranged from the white people. No argument that served this infamous design of the leaders, however unfounded and malignant, was omitted. They excited the passions and prejudices of the colored race by the most flagrant and willful misrepresentations, unhappily impressing their too confiding followers with the belief that if the white men obtained control of legislation they, the colored people, would be deprived of their rights and be again reduced to slavery. This led to the colored men nominating for office mainly colored men or whites who were only intent on securing political office and the emoluments arising therefrom. Ignorance and dishonesty obtained the mastery, with the effect of driving nearly every white republican into the conservative ranks in local politics.

We cannot conceive of a more unhappy condition of society than exists as a result of the reconstruction laws and the rule of the corrupt men who were invested with authority by the policy of the National Government and the republican party. All offices in the State of any importance, from the governor down, are filled by men who encourage the maintenance of the color line, and who regard the white element of the State as disloyal and rebellious. In this category they class many men who have always supported the republican party in national politics, and many who were officers and soldiers in the Federal Army during the late war.

The conservative side includes, with few exceptions, all the tax-payers, the professional, commercial, and industrial classes. The same intelligence, culture, and refinement which distinguish American society in the other cities of the Union are to be found among the white class in Vicksburgh. They have a just pride in their State, and are as loyal to the Government of the United States as the citizens of any other State. They yield a willing obedience to the Constitution with all its amendments, and to the laws passed in pursuance thereof, but complain, not without reason, of the policy that has made them the subjects of a rule based on ignorance and corruption, upheld by the military power of the Republic of which they are citizens, and as such entitled to countenance and protection.

The color line, which has established the relations of the two political parties toward each other in Mississippi, is the inevitable result of the policy pursued by the State government and the leaders of the colored men.

The white people have exhausted every means of conciliation. So long as the most depraved white men in the State can maintain their control of the majority of colored voters, and pursue the systematized robbery that characterizes their government throughout the counties, the honest and intelligent white men must be arrayed against them. The preservation of their homes and property will, without regard to political considerations, cause them to remain united as one man so long as the hope of a return to honest rule remains.

There is not the least foundation in the testimony for the charge that the white people oppose or vote against candidates for office on account of their color, nor for the pretense that any of the proceedings of the citizens of Vicksburgh, in December last, were prompted by the color of the corrupt officials. Nor can it be asserted from anything in the testimony that the whites have ever interfered with the exercise of the right of franchise by the colored men. But as to both white men and colored, when candidates for office, they do insist upon their integrity and capability.

Further, the testimony conclusively shows that there do not exist any organizations for political purposes different in character and object from those which usually prevail in all political parties in the Northern States. Political differences are tolerated with as much freedom as they obtain in any locality north of the Ohio. Intimidation of any kind for political purposes is only known in the ranks of the colored men. They are often restricted by members of their own race through the medium of their secret associations, where it is inculcated as a crime and disgrace for any colored voter to support conservative candidates for office. By means of the influence exercised through their religious as well as political meetings, the great mass of the colored race are constrained to keep within the line of the republican party.

The want of confidence in the whites by the colored men in politics does not extend to matters of business, where the interest of the two races is in common. The political leaders of the colored people exert but little influence in that regard, as all branches of trade and commerce are controlled by the whites. Very few colored men are engaged in trade except as employés, and with rare exceptions they accumulate but little property. In the line of production throughout the counties, their efforts are confined to the raising of a few bales of cotton, which, with vegetables raised for home consumption, afford them a living suitable to their desires.

The relations of the two races outside of the domain of politics are eminently friendly. Kindness on the part of the white people toward the colored is universal, and we have little doubt would be reciprocated by them were they free from the wicked influences which control them.

The foundation of their antipathy to the whites is the devotion with which they follow their political leaders and their preachers, for the two are generally united in the same person. They seem blind to the infamous character of the men who control them for the worst purposes.

The condition of the colored people has not improved under the operation of existing laws. From all the evidences of their state that were brought to our attention, their moral tone is of a very low degree, and would not be considered an advance from their condition before enfranchisement. The manner in which they exercise the franchise is a mockery.

Even education, so far as diffused among them, seems not to have aided them in reaching a higher plane of citizenship. Its advantages seem to be accepted only as a qualification for the rôle of the baser sort of politician, to the extent that every man among them who has acquired a show of learning strives to become a leader in the arena of politics. A little learning is a dangerous thing in its application to them. The educated among them are the most dangerous class in the community, as they exercise a malign and blighting influence over the future prospects of their race. They fill the offices, and with few exceptions fall an easy prey to the temptations to dishonesty and corrupt practices. Their aim seems to be to intensify the hostility already invoked against the white race, and their purposes are ably seconded by the white adventurers who find in the emoluments of political office among them a fitting reward for their unworthy and ignoble position.

The tax imposed in all the counties of the State for school purposes is very heavy and is cheerfully paid. It is fairly distributed among the two races, and there is reason to indulge the hope of a great improvement in the rising generation over the men that now so sadly misrule the State.

The general condition of the State has greatly declined. Lands to the extent of one-fifth of the whole State have been forfeited for the non-payment of taxes. At the same rate of retrogression as the misgovernment of the last few years discloses it will not be many years before the State will be "the monarch of all it surveys."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the issue is clearly joined between these two reports. The one asserting that military organizations exist to nullify the acts of Congress granting the right of all citizens to vote and hold office without distinction of color, and the other denying the existence of such organizations. The issue is also clear in regard to the intimidation of colored voters, the majority report stating that it is the intention of white men of high character and position to control and override the colored vote by force and intimidation. The minority report charges the formation of the "color line" on the negroes and the white adventurers that control them; further, that the white men are forced to unite in order to save their remaining property from confiscation by devouring taxes and the corruption and frauds of republican officials.

On the question of the "white or color line" I read the testimony of Colonel Horace Miller, one of the most distinguished lawyers in Mississippi, who has been prominent in the recent movements in Vicksburgh. He was called and examined by the chairman.

On cross-examination he testified as follows:

By Mr. O'BRIEN:

Question. Colonel, state if you have occupied any official position under the city or State government; and if so, when?

Answer. In 1867 I was judge of the criminal court of Warren County. I occupied the position a year, I think. I have occupied Federal positions; in 1852 I was appointed chargé d'affaires to Bolivia, South America, which position I occupied between three or four years.

Q. Can you, from your knowledge of political affairs in Mississippi, inform the committee of the meaning of the language of the newspapers, when they speak of the "color line" and the "white line," and is the application of those terms to the condition of political and social affairs in this State?

A. I think I understand the meaning and import of the "color-line" term, as understood in this State. For some years after the war the white citizens of Mississippi made an earnest effort to accommodate themselves to the new condition of affairs, and undertook to assimilate themselves with the negro-voting population, and they endeavored to hold out every inducement to that class to discard all questions of mere condition originating from color, and in conventions, both State and county, for the nomination of public officers in carrying out this plan, they put upon our tickets colored men for various political positions. This effort was continued for six years, but met with no success. It became a well-recognized fact that every colored man who permitted his name to be put upon the ticket of what was called either the democratic or conservative party, was immediately ostracized by his own race; and no matter what had been the previous position with his race and party of any such individual, the acceptance of such a nomination resulted in his being immediately discarded by the party. After many unsuccessful efforts in that direction, a feeling grew up in the community that it was impossible to conciliate that element; that the difficulties in the way of such conciliation were insurmountable; that the prejudices of that race were continually employed against the whites by appeals made to them by what are generally known as carpet-baggers, political adventurers, and some of the worst elements of our race. These appeals were made to them upon the ground that the whites were their natural enemies. Exaggerated statements were constantly made to them of the cruelties and punishments that had been inflicted upon them while they were in a state of slavery; that the democratic or conservative party would ultimately reduce them to a condition of slavery, and that their only safety was in strictly adhering to the republican party. Every element of discord that could possibly be imagined by these people was constantly kept before them, and the result was that in every election, State, county, and municipal, for a series of years the negroes were voted almost in solid mass and almost even carried to the polls as if in military array, each body under its leaders and subordinates, where they would remain until whole columns were voted, the leaders handing to each voter his ticket as he stood by the ballot-box to deposit it, and in many cases the leader depositing the ballot himself. This condition of things produced what is known as the "color line." The "color line" means that the whites of this State have become satisfied that it is useless further to attempt to coalesce with the negro element in voting; that it has been demonstrated by experience that that class of the community is incapable of properly administering the duties of any office for the benefit of the community; that therefore it has been determined for the future that none but white men will be nominated or voted for for office by persons who favor the "color line" in this State; but that with no intention of depriving the colored citizens of the right of franchise, or of any rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution or its amendments, or the laws of Congress, or of the State of Mississippi. In other words, I would like to add simply that they feel that they are driven to the "color line" by the fact that the colored element has adhered to such a line ever since they were invested with the rights of citizens.

Q. I understand you, then, to state, that the effect of the division of your people upon political matters on the "color line" does not in any sense impair all the political and civil rights of the colored people guaranteed to them under the United States or State laws?

A. I never heard a suggestion made in this State, either in the newspapers, in conventions, or in private conversation, of any intention to abridge any of the rights and privileges now enjoyed by the colored people.

Q. Do the white people of Mississippi accept, in good faith, all the recent amendments to the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof?

A. I believe that the white people of the State do so accept them and are willing to abide by them.

Q. Are colored men free to vote according to their choice in this community? If not, state what prevents their doing so.

A. Unquestionably they are free to vote according to their choice, and it is constantly and persistently urged upon them that they not only have the right so to do but that it is a duty that they owe to their country, as well as to themselves, to exercise that right. That duty is impressed upon them through the public newspapers and speeches and in private conversations constantly.

Mr. Speaker, after accepting the appointment as a member of the committee I resolved to exert all my power to discover the facts in relation to the condition of political parties in Mississippi, and in the examination of witnesses I was as searching as possible to reach the truth, and therefore mainly conducted the examination of witnesses in reference to that matter. I propose to read at length from the testimony so as to cover all possible objections and to conclusively establish the fact as far as evidence can do so that the political troubles in Mississippi, and I believe in all the Southern States, are justly chargeable to the negro element as supported by the carpet-bag element under the protection of the republican administration. Colonel Miller was further examined by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] and testified as follows:

Q. You have spoken of the color line. If I understand you correctly, you stated that the object, so far as you understood it, of that movement was to see to it that white men should be elected to office?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By what means, in a community where you state the majority is three to one in favor of the colored men, does the color line propose to bring about that result?

A. I do not know that it was contemplated to bring about that result in a community where the negroes were numerically in the majority; but it was supposed that if a united white vote could be obtained throughout the State, that, in consequence of non-voting on the part of a portion of the colored people, and in sections where they are not numerically in the majority, and where they would be relieved from the pressure of the intimidation of their own color, that a portion of them could be induced, by reason and argument, to vote with the whites, and thereby overthrow the twenty or twenty-five thousand majority in the State.

Q. Then I understand you now that those who are engaged in the "color line" do not deny any portion of the colored vote as auxiliaries?

A. No, sir; on the contrary, as I understand it, the "color line" would very gladly accept the votes of such colored men as cuose to vote that way.

Q. There is, then, such an organization in the city of Vicksburgh?

A. When you speak of it as an organization, I do not believe there is one. They have never had a State convention; the party throughout the State has never, by any concerted action, indorsed the movement or the platform adopted by the color line, and they have no clubs or political organizations known to my knowledge as the color-line clubs.

Q. Under those circumstances how do you happen to know that this color-line organization exists throughout the State?

A. I know it from the public newspapers and from the public speeches, as well as from private conversations with individuals.

Q. The object throughout the State is the same, as I understand it, which you have avowed here?

A. Yes, sir. I might add to that that I presume the movement is yet in its incipiency, and it is proposed hereafter to crystallize it into a regular political organization.

Q. The modes of operation that are contemplated to influence the minds of the colored people are, as I think you have stated, simply such as are addressed to their convictions and reason?

A. More especially to their interest.

Q. I have understood you, colonel, to say that so far as you know there does not exist any secret political organization in this region of country?

A. None, sir.

Mr. Speaker, I now propose to read an extract from the testimony of a stanch republican, a northern man, who was a powerful agent in the formation of the loyal leagues of the South and is now a republican senator in the State Legislature. It will be found that in some unimportant particulars the witnesses differ from each other in their views of the political situation, but the testimony will be found uniform and consistent to the main facts.

General Furlong was examined by me and cross-examined by the chairman, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER:]

Question. Are you a resident of Vicksburgh?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. And have been elected to the senate of Mississippi as a republican?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I presume you are competent then to judge of society here, as it exists between the colored and white men; and, if so, I desire you to state to the committee whether or not there is that amity of feeling that should exist between the two races, and if there is not what may be the reason.

A. Well, I think there is rather a hostile feeling at present, caused by the corruption of the officials here, and the total disregard of the board of supervisors to obey the wishes of the people and carry out the law as they should have done. I think you may say that is the principal cause.

Q. Does that want of amity exist toward the colored people as a race?

A. No, sir; because one of the colored office-holders here, Mr. Newton, has not been molested or disturbed, holding one of the most lucrative positions in the county.

Q. Is there on the part of the white citizens of this county any objection to honest, capable colored men holding office?

A. None whatever, so far as my knowledge goes; not as a whole.

Q. What is the disposition on the part of the white people of Warren County and the city of Vicksburgh to acknowledge the rights guaranteed by law to the colored men?

A. They acknowledge them, sir, and have no disposition to act hostile. On the contrary, they are very anxious to live on peaceable and amicable terms with them.

Q. Then I understand you to say that any mistrust or want of amity existing between colored men and white men may be traced to the official delinquencies of men in power?

A. Yes, sir; that is the sole cause, in my judgment.

Q. What is the political character of these officials who have been delinquent?

A. Republicans, sir. All the officials in the county are republicans.

Q. You trace the feeling existing in the community entirely to that fact?

A. Entirely to that fact.

Q. Do you know whether in the city of Vicksburgh there are any officers, colored men, lately elected to office?

A. Yes, sir, one of the school trustees.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I understand you that you have not among the white people of Warren County and Vicksburgh any distinction such as is called the "color line?"

A. I do not exactly understand your question. What do you mean by the "color line?"

Q. I understand you to say this, that the only objection that you know of among the people of Warren County and the city of Vicksburgh to the colored people arose, not because these officials are colored, but because of their delinquencies?

A. That, sir, is my impression.

Q. And that you have not, within the circle of your observation, noticed that there was any such thing as a "color line?"

A. There was such a thing stated in the papers, but I have seen no practical illustration of such a thing, according to my opinion of things.

Q. Did you hear Colonel Miller's testimony?

A. I know nothing about what Colonel Miller testified to. I heard only a portion of it.

Q. As far as your observation goes, you do not think there exists in the minds of the white people of Vicksburgh an idea that the colored people have shown themselves unfit to be trusted with office?

A. The white people think that they have shown themselves unfitted for office, for holding position; provided the colored people are competent and honest, they have got no objection to them.

Q. Colonel Miller stated in his testimony here substantially, that a conviction had arisen and become settled in the minds of the white people of Vicksburgh and the county generally that the colored people as a class had shown themselves unfit to be trusted with office; and that therefore they formed the "color line," as it is called, which means that only white men should hold office. Have you ever heard of any such distinction?

A. No, sir. I think that Colonel Miller is a closer observer of such things than I am.

Q. Then you have never heard of such sentiments from the people of Vicksburgh and the county?

A. No, sir.

Q. You say, in addition, in your judgment, Colonel Miller is a closer observer of public sentiment than you are?

A. In connection with the "color line" I think he is.

Q. And would be a better judge of the existence of such a faction, if it exists, from his better means of observation?

A. He has not got any better means of observation, but he may be a closer observer.

Q. When you say you were elected as a republican senator, do you mean that you are still in accord with the republican party of Mississippi?

A. I am in accord with the republican party of the Union, but not of Mississippi. I am in accord with all republicans whom I believe to be honest.

I now read from the testimony of Mr. E. C. Butts, cashier of the Vicksburgh Bank. He was examined at great length by the chairman and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] in reference to the general condition of affairs in the State, and particularly in Warren County, and on cross-examination testified as follows in answer to questions from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] and myself:

By Mr. O'BRIEN:

Question. Growing out of the excitement, no matter how caused, was there any feeling of hatred or objection to the negroes as a class here?

Answer. There is no hostility in the world existing between the white people of the South and the negro as a negro.

Q. I am alluding particularly to Vicksburgh.

A. None whatever. There is the kindest feeling imaginable—in fact, negroes are allowed to associate with the white people. There is always a kindly feeling. I have myself stopped at elections to go and talk with a negro who had been acquainted with me for many years, whom I had assisted in many different ways, who desired to consult me or ask my advice. We would step off a few feet and talk, and we were invariably watched by men like Crosby and Davenport and Ben Allen, and that crowd of negroes, who would look daggers at us, and as soon as we left them they would go and get hold of them and take them to the police. Between the negro and the white people here there is no hatred whatever, I assure you. There is hardly a time when we don't give them subscriptions; they are brought around day after day. We have never refused to assist their churches or to assist their affairs, and we present them with little tokens of regard during Christmas and holidays. They have always been treated with the greatest kindness, and seem to appreciate it, and it was only when these negroes overawed them, as we considered it, that they were alienated from us. One of them has lived with me in the bank for many years, and he is intrusted with matters of great responsibility. He takes all the letters, whether valuable or not, and has charge of the post-office key—carries it home with him—and the kindest feeling exists toward him, and has for fifteen or twenty years.

Q. Is there a cordial recognition in Warren County and Vicksburgh upon the part of white citizens of all the civil and political rights of the colored men as guaranteed by law?

A. They are recognized as being free and equal in every respect before the law.

Q. And there is no purpose, nor has there been in any of these proceedings, to intimidate the negro or to deprive him of any of his political or civil rights?

A. None whatever, sir.

Q. I understand you to say that the feeling in regard to color had no bearing upon any of these proceedings between your people and the negroes?

A. It has never in the tax-payers' meeting entered into their discussions. I say honestly, and with a full realization of the responsibility of an oath, that we never in the league had anything to say in regard to color.

Q. I mean outside of the league, among your citizens?

A. No, sir; no feeling of antagonism against them on account of race, as evidenced by our treatment.

Q. Did you hear the testimony yesterday, that it is the determination of the white people that the colored men of this county and State were unsuitable naturally to hold office, and therefore that all the white people here were intending by the "color line," as it is called, to prevent their holding office?

A. No, sir.

Q. What do you say in regard to the proposition that from the inefficiency of the colored people to manage their public affairs the feeling of the white people is generally that they should not be permitted to hold office?

A. We believe that men should occupy public positions who are honest, capable, and faithful, without regard to color at all. That is the sentiment of all classes of business men.

Q. Is there a feeling among the white people that the colored people have shown such inefficiency and incompetency in the management of public affairs that they should not for that reason be permitted to hold office?

A. No, sir; it is not confined to the negroes, but we believe to every republican, pretty much, that we have had a sample of down here.

Q. Does it extend to the negroes?

A. It takes them in, of course, sir.

Q. As a class?

A. No, sir; not as a class. We believe that the republican officials have not shown themselves either competent, faithful, or honest, as a body.

Q. Then I understand you to say that the feeling of the white people of this region is that neither republicans nor negroes are fit to hold office?

A. From our experience they have not demonstrated that they were.

Q. And it is on that ground that you draw the line—not a color line, but a political line?

A. I don't know what the color line is. I always vote for a man if he is honest, capable, and faithful. I have voted for negroes several times since the war. I don't know what the color line is, except "is he faithful, capable, and honest, irrespective of color."

Q. The distinction you make in regard to politics is comprehended in the answer to this question, "is he capable, honest, and faithful?"

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you would support a colored man equally with a white man if he had these qualifications?

A. I have done so.

Q. With your present feelings, would you?

A. Yes, sir; I would. I expect to do it before very long.

The foregoing testimony sufficiently demonstrates that the "color line," if sought to be made a political distinction, is only because experience has proven that negroes are disqualified for office by their utter incapacity and dishonesty. But, sir, it demonstrates the further fact that the white adventurers and allies of the negro are placed within the same line, as unfit to rule the State.

I now invite attention to the testimony of another witness, whose utterances should command the approval even of the republican party, Frederick Speed, a republican judge, after he had served with honorable distinction in the Federal Army through the entire late war. His lot had been cast among those against whom he had battled for over four years. Having the confidence of the Government, he had been placed in high positions, and was among the first in Mississippi to organize the newly-enfranchised negroes into loyal political leagues. Always a republican in politics, he is still an avowed adherent of that party. In answer to questions he states:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Is there, or not, any feeling among the white people of this city and county, or any purpose, to intimidate or in any manner interfere with the privileges of the colored people as guaranteed to them by national and State law?

Answer. There may possibly be some obscure individuals who would like to deny to the negroes their civil rights, but all opposition to their voting and holding office has long since died out among the white people here. I think that no man could be successfully intimidated from voting as he saw fit, unless he were intimidated by the negroes; that is, other negroes would not permit him to vote the democratic or people's ticket. I have been told repeatedly by negroes that they didn't dare to vote with the white people, and I know that after the last county election the few men who did it—I would not say exactly that their lives were in danger, but they were threatened and hooted at by the colored people, more especially the colored women; and in fact there was a species of ostracism organized among them, and those few colored men who did vote with the white people at the county election three years ago and a year ago, and at the city election, were denounced for their treason to their color, as they put it. The thing is entirely changed; then there was great opposition and frequent intimidation, but the shoe has got upon the other foot now.

Q. You say, then there was intimidation?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. From whom did you mean?
A. The democrats, sir.
Q. And now from whom?
A. From the colored people; they have been apt scholars.

By Mr. O'BRIEN:

Q. I desire you to state to the committee briefly what is the meaning, as you understand it, of the words "color line."

A. Well, sir, I don't think there is any such thing as a color line to start upon. There has been some talk in the newspapers about organizing upon a color line; but if there has been any such organization, I am not aware of it; what people mean by the color line, when you come to pin them down, is the election of honest and capable men. I have not heard among the advocates of the color line that they propose to deny to the negro the right of franchise or the right to hold office; there is a preference, growing out of the utter failure of the colored people as politicians, for white people; but what is meant, as I understand it, by the color line is simply an attempt to secure honest and capable public officials. It must be borne in mind that the colored people themselves have organized upon a color line; they were the originators of the movement; and, unfortunately, I think, the white people have the faculty of falling into the same errors with the colored people in that regard. The colored people have long since been organized upon a color line. At the last city election here seven of the eight aldermen nominated upon their ticket were colored men; of the county officers in this county, there are at the present time but three white men holding office: Mr. Short, who was appointed by Governor Ames as clerk of the circuit court after Mr. Dorsey's defalcations; Mr. Axleson, a member of the board of supervisors; and Captain Bourne, the assessor; all other white men have been thrown off and discarded by the colored people, and I don't think it is possible for Captain Bourne or Mr. Axleson or Mr. Short to be elected to the positions they now hold again by the colored people.

Q. Then I understand you to say that there is not, to your knowledge, nor do you know from information, of any political organization of white people formed on what is called the color line in the city of Vicksburgh or in the county of Warren?

A. I know of none, sir; I don't believe there is any such line.

Judge Warren Cowan, first president of the tax-payers' league, testifies to the same points:

Question. Have you known anybody to have been intimidated from voting in the direction of his political inclination in this city or county within the last twelve months?

Answer. No, sir.

Q. What is the general feeling that prevails among the white people toward colored people, politically and otherwise?

A. The feeling between the white people and colored people, so far as I know, is a feeling of good-will and mutual interest and friendship. There are occasional exceptions.

Q. On both sides?
A. Yes, sir; on both sides.
Q. Is there a general recognition upon the part of the people of this city and county of the civil and political rights of the colored men as guaranteed by law?
A. There is, decidedly.
Q. No desire to interfere with their rights?
A. No, sir; not generally. There are some exceptions, of which I have spoken.
Q. If parties are divided in this city and county, is that owing to the action of the colored people?

A. It was owing to the action of the colored people in the first place; and what is known as the color line was never drawn by the white people, or attempted to be drawn in any manner that I know of previous to the last city election here in August.

Q. Why was that done at that time?

A. It was done for this reason, I suppose: I would state that there are no two white men, and I am satisfied no two black men, in this county who agree, so far as my observation is concerned, about what the color line is. Every man seems to have his own opinion about what the color line is. I may say, however, that I explained to the executive committee of the county clubs and people's clubs that what we most desired was to organize all the white people in the county into political clubs, and with a view of having every white man's name enrolled in the county so that we could depend upon his vote at any election; that when that was done it would be time enough to talk about going into the ranks of colored people and enrolling them into political clubs with a view of acting with the white people; that after they were satisfied that we had enrolled all the white people in the county and State we could get five colored men then to act with us where we only could get one in the commencement; that in order to recruit from the ranks of the enemy we must present a solid phalanx of our own first. I will go on to state that it was proposed by several members of the club to organize these clubs, white and black, together; an objection was made to that, and this other plan was agreed upon. I will state, however, that I am the president of the third ward club in this city, which is the largest club in the county, and we have some ten or fifteen colored men in that club. We have also in the fourth ward club a number of colored men enrolled as members of the club, and they have acted with us and voted with us in the nominating conventions.

Q. Then I understand you to say that the white people in this city and county desire an alliance with the colored people for mutual protection and for the election of honest and competent officials?

A. Yes, sir.

One more reference to the testimony in relation to the "color line and intimidation." Judge J. W. M. Harris, one of the most distinguished citizens of the State, a man of ripe culture and occupying the front rank among the lawyers of the South, testifies as follows:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. With your views of the political relationship of men in the United States to the Government, is it your belief that the absolute political equality of all citizens under the Constitution is recognized?

Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. To vote, hold office, and exercise every political right?
A. Yes, sir. You are speaking of this community?
Q. Every one, of all people, all citizens of the United States.
A. I can only answer so far as this community is concerned.
Q. Do you recognize the absolute political equality of all citizens of the United States?
A. I do, undoubtedly.
Q. Then when you intimate that one class of citizens, as a class and as a color, have proved themselves unfit to exercise all these duties of citizenship, that of holding office and managing affairs as well as exercising the franchise, you attribute it to their incapacity as a class?

A. I attribute it to their want of education and their want of understanding the genius of American institutions under which we live.

By Mr. SPEER:

Q. Are, in your judgment, the politics of this State and county controlled by men who are not identified with the interests of either?

A. Yes, sir; especially in the State at large. Some of the counties are exceptions, but, as a general rule, they are controlled by men who are scarcely tax-payers. The governor of the State himself is, I believe, not a tax-payer; if he is, he is only nominally so.

Q. What has been the effect of this course upon the administration of justice in your State?

A. It has been most disastrous. I have been practicing law in this court for twenty years, and I have given a great deal of attention to the question of juries and to the results of the trials of cases before juries. In ordinary cases, where there is no party question arising, where there is simply one issue, the colored juries and white juries mix together in the jury, and do very well, and they generally attempt to obey the instructions of the court. A majority of them get the instructions confused, and very frequently they don't understand what the judge means when he is giving his instructions. In nine cases out of ten I would almost as soon draw straws as to speculate upon what the verdict of a petit jury will be in this county, even where the instructions are given in absolutely plain language.

Q. Under your law does the judge charge the jury after the conclusion of the arguments of counsel?

A. No, sir; he charges them before, and then the counsel address themselves to the jury within the line of instructions.

Q. Are the instructions general, or confined to written points submitted by the counsel?

A. Written points submitted by the counsel.
Q. What does the judge do when the points are submitted?
A. He either gives the instructions as asked by them, modifies them, or refuses them altogether.
Q. If a written point is put to him, what does he do?

A. The counsel write out their instructions, submit them to the court on both sides, and then the court takes them under advisement, and corrects them to suit his ideas of the law.

Q. Do these written points, if they agree with the judge's ideas, go to the jury?
A. Yes, sir. And then I have seen them come back to get an explanation of the instructions which were given to them.
Q. Do you know that it sometimes occurs that there is not a single juror who can read the instructions?

A. I know it has often occurred in my experience that nine out of the twelve could not read them. I tried a very important insurance case before a jury of that sort, involving a very large amount of money, in which witnesses from New York, Connecticut, Ohio, Chicago—insurance experts—came here. We were ten days in litigation, and I am satisfied that only about three out of the twelve understood anything about the case; because I talked to the jury afterward, the colored men especially, and one of them didn't even know what a policy of insurance was. My northern friends were extremely disgusted with the whole concern.

Q. In your judgment, judge, is there any disposition or desire on the part of the white people of this county or State to interfere with or abridge the legal rights of the colored people?

A. None whatever, sir; the contrary is true, in my judgment. After the war the white men, under the advice of such men as General Lee and the leaders here, were disinclined to take any prominent part in political affairs. We were advised that it was best for us to show the Government of the United States that we didn't want an active part, and we took a back seat. Nearly all the leading men took this attitude, and other men came in and took advantage of these ignorant men to bind them into a political machine; and they taught them to hate and despise the democratic people as their bitterest enemies, and they do do it.

Q. Whatever objection, if any, there is on the part of the white race to the colored race holding public office, you say, then, that it extends only to the belief of their incapacity?

A. That is it, sir; to their incapacity to manage public affairs, not to them as a class, or not because of their color.

Q. They have, as a rule, proved themselves incapable of administering public affairs?

A. Truly so, as a rule. There are some exceptions to that. This man Lynch, who is a Representative to the lower House, is a very capable man; but the most of them are incompetent.

Q. Are the negroes easily led and controlled by their leaders; those who have their confidence?

A. Very easily; they are just as easily led as children. I am satisfied that if I could be heard by them and listened to by them, I could very easily lead them.

Q. Was there at any time in this county or State any unlawful combination or attempted opposition to the negroes holding office or voting?

A. None whatever; never has been a political organization armed of any sort in this county. I have known as many as one hundred and fifty men to be arrested and brought before the United States court at Jackson at one time under the Ku-Klux laws, and not one single conviction; I have simply known men to get up and enter a plea of guilty rather than to submit to costs and delay; I have never yet seen a conviction under that law; I have frequently defended them.

This is the testimony of an honest and conscientious gentleman, whose ample experience enables him to speak with authority. He vindicates the people of his State from the aspersions of the majority report, and establishes the necessity of a restoration of government to the intelligent and capable men whose interests are now committed to the hands of the ignorant and corrupt.

Mr. Speaker, in order to establish two important points in reference to the action of the white people of Vicksburgh, I will quote from the testimony extracts of the evidence given by Judge Speed as to the fraudulent officials, and by Judge Lee, the district attorney, in reference to the number of homicides committed and the prompt administration of law in the State of Mississippi.

Judge Speed testifies:

By Mr. O'BRIEN:

Question. How long did you serve as judge?
Answer. I held two terms of the court.
Q. You will state to the committee what party in politics you are a member of.
A. A member of the republican party, sir, although I have not been acting with the republicans of Mississippi for some time past.
Q. Yet in national politics you are a republican?
A. Yes, sir; never have been anything else.
Q. Are you familiar with the causes of the troubles in Warren County which you are investigating?
A. I think I am, sir.
Q. State, if you please, in your own language, to what you attribute the troubles which have ensued in this county for some time past?
A. The troubles have been brewing for several years past, and originated in the misadministration of the government by the county officials, and also to some extent in the misadministration of the State government.
Q. To what county officials do you allude?
A. Well, sir, there is scarcely an exception, I think; there are some few men who have been competent who have held office within the last five years in this county, but very few, sir.
Q. Can you specify the names of the offices held by them, or rather the names of the men to whom you refer as having been corrupt?
A. Yes, sir; I think I can do so. I refer to Peter Crosby, a late sheriff of this county; George W. Davenport, the present clerk of the chancery court, and ex officio clerk of the board of the supervisors; A. W. Dorsey, late clerk of the circuit court; a man by the name of Benson, who was an employé of George W. Davenport in the office of the chancery court; Thomas W. Cardozo, late clerk of the chancery court of this county, and at present State superintendent of public education; Sydney Brooks, justice of the peace; C. W. Joshua, late a justice of the peace; T. W. Broadwater, late wharf and harbor master of the city of Vicksburgh; Benjamin A. Lee, late mayor of the city of Vicksburgh; Ben. Allen, late a deputy special constable; the late city government of Vicksburgh, with possibly one or two exceptions among its members; and the board of supervisors of Warren County, with possibly one exception. I refer to all these as having been corrupt in the administration of their several offices, and I may say that most of these parties have been wholly incompetent for the stations which they have attempted to fill.
Q. To what party in politics do the officers whom you have named belong?
A. The radical branch of the republican party.
Q. Were they at the time of their election members of that party?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. To what extent do you identify Crosby as one of the corrupt officials?
A. I think Mr. Crosby has been guilty of numerous corruptions in his office. Of course I speak to a certain extent upon information. I believe what has been currently reported in this community for a long time past, but which I have full reason to believe is founded on fact. Mr. Crosby is said to have, while treasurer of this county, funded the same county warrants two or three times. I think that he corruptly influenced parties to perjure themselves in justifying as sureties upon his bond as sheriff. I think that he has corruptly influenced the board of supervisors not to meet and take action in regard to the sureties upon his bond. I understand he has appropriated the grand jurors' warrants, issued from the auditor's office in settlement of the compensation of grand jurors of this county, to his own personal account in making his settlement with the auditor, and not accounting for them to the grand jurors. I think he has been guilty of summoning persons for jurors whom he knew were wholly unfitted to perform the duty of jurors; and that after one larceny of the public records from the court-house, and after he had made a solemn pledge to take up the keys held by various parties to the court-house, who were not entitled to the same, he being by law the exclusive custodian, he unlawfully permitted other parties to retain those keys, by which they gained access to a portion of the public records, upon the very same evening after he had made this solemn pledge, and thereby allowed them to be stolen. I think that he was corruptly influenced by T. W. Cardozo in accepting the sureties upon his (Cardozo's) bond, the said Cardozo at the time being under indictment to answer for criminal offenses in this county. I think that he, knowing that his own bond was wholly insufficient and improper, has corruptly refused to give a new or better bond, in utter defiance of the law and his duty in the premises.

Judge Lee testifies as follows:

By Mr. SPEER:

Question. Have you any doubt, as a law-officer of the State for this district, of the guilt of Cardozo, Davenport, Dorsey, and Perkins?
Answer. Bearing in mind that every man is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is fully established, upon evidence that has come under my observation I must say I have no doubt at all; but you know the testimony before the grand jury is ex parte. I do not know what defense they will be able to give.
Q. Are Davenport, Cardozo, and Perkins all colored men, and friends of Peter Crosby, the sheriff?
A. I believe they are; that is the understanding. I think they are friends and intimates.
Q. Do you believe that Peter Crosby, as sheriff, under the existing law of your State, if he had the selection of jurors—that the State in these prosecutions against the prisoners whom I have named can get justice?
A. Well, it is a question about which I have been very much embarrassed to know what to do with these cases. I have doubted if I would be able to have the law administered without its being necessary for me to use some special influence in order to secure a fair jury.
Q. Why have you been embarrassed?
A. Because of the peculiar condition of things that exists here in connection with those indictments and the relations of the parties.
Q. How does this peculiar condition of things affect the administration of justice in these special cases?
A. Mr. Cardozo was at one time a right popular man. He was not here more than six months before he had been appointed to office, and he had a good deal of influence with the colored people here. He has his friends. Davenport is a popular young man with the colored people. He has his friends. Dorsey has his set of friends. Perkins has his set of friends, and they are all in the same boat. The sheriff is a colored man. He has his set of friends, and they are all friends together. Now, you can very well see that if there was a disposition on the part of anybody to have men put on the jury who were friends of these indictees, it would be a very hard matter to do it.
Q. How could they do it?
A. By the sheriff going out and selecting a list of names of men who might be pointed out to him by Messrs. Cardozo, Davenport, or Perkins.
Q. Have you any doubt that, with Mr. Crosby as sheriff, that will be done?
A. I cannot say I have no doubt, because the deputy would have the summoning of the jury.
Q. Do you fear such a result if Crosby selects the jury?
A. I should have some apprehension.
Q. I understand you, then, judge, to say, as the prosecuting officer of this district for the State, that you have no doubt of the guilt of those parties, and yet from the peculiar manner in which your jurors are selected you fear that justice cannot be had in their trial?
A. Yes, sir, I do. I hope the law will be properly administered. I have serious apprehensions as to whether we can get in this county here a fair trial of these parties.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. In this district, in cases of homicide, are there many cases where the offenders are not arrested?
A. Not unless they flee.
Q. Do many flee?
A. No, sir; not a great many.
Q. Take, say, in this judicial district for the last two years, are you able to give the committee an estimate of the number of homicides that have been committed in these counties composing your district?
A. Not accurately; I do not think they exceed more than from fifteen to twenty.
Q. Of these how many have been arrested?
A. Most of them—two-thirds, perhaps three-fourths.
Q. Are there not many cases where inquests are not held upon the bodies?
A. Not many. I think the error is the other way. They hold inquests for the sake of getting fees, when perhaps there is no necessity for it.
Q. In those cases is it difficult in this section to discover the offenders?
A. No more so than in other parts of the country. Secret murders are not more common here than they are in almost any other country.
Q. You think offenders are as promptly arrested and punished here as elsewhere?
A. As a general thing they are arrested, perhaps not always convicted.
Q. That is so in the case of colored men, is it not?
A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the above-cited testimony of the frauds and corruption in official life, the augmentation of taxes to the verge of confiscation, and the entire incapacity for government exhibited by the men who rule Mississippi, it will not be difficult to understand the justice of the conclusions of the white citizens of Mississippi in reference to the majority of colored men holding office. The testimony demonstrates the unfairness of the conclusions of the majority report, and proves that military organizations for political purposes have no existence in Mississippi; that intimidation of the colored voters is never resorted to, and that the people have accepted in good faith the amendments to the Constitution and the statutes passed to enforce the equal rights of every citizen. As my time is about to expire, I earnestly commend to the consideration of the House the condition of affairs I have shown to prevail in Mississippi, and I feel assured, that upon reflection the country will do justice to that patient and suffering people.

Alabama Affairs—The Force Bill.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. CALDWELL,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, during the last decade Alabama, in common with her sister Southern States, has been at the mercy of her conquerors. She has been the victim of congressional reconstruction, and with patience, long-suffering, and Christian forbearance has endured the untold and innumerable wrongs which have followed the miserable and abortive efforts of the party in power to restore the Southern States to their former status in the Union.

Among these wrongs she has been compelled by a political coercion if not by one of actual force, to live under a constitution which her people had no hand in making; to submit to unjust and oppressive laws, framed and fashioned by designing men in the interest of every conceivable species of fraud and corruption. Under the operation of this constitution and these laws she has been forced to see the stranger enter her gates and plunder her cities. The convening of her General Assemblies have at times been the occasion, and her legislative halls have been the theater, upon which the boldest villainies have been planned, by which her treasury has been depleted and her credit, never before shaken, much impaired if not completely destroyed. Since reconstruction, through the instrumentality of laws intended to encourage fraud in elections, the republican party has held high carnival in Alabama. But in the late elections the true men of the State, those who were most interested in the welfare of the country, rose in the majesty of their manhood, and, by the peaceful means of the ballot, drove from power and place the rulers who had been oppressing the people.

This result has provoked the blatant cry of "fraud, intimidation, and murder."

While republicans were in power in Alabama everything was calm, serene, and lovely! But now, since the democratic party is in the ascendant there, everything, in their virtuous eyes, has suddenly become discordant, disorderly, and rebellious!

Alabama must be again investigated! Her people must be turned over per force of Federal law to the tender mercies of that partisan hate which they have so lately and so signally rebuked.

I am therefore bold, Mr. Speaker, in declaring to the House and the country, that the bill under consideration was conceived in the interest of party, and is not the offspring of patriotic desire. It is intended to perpetuate wrong, and not to cure existing evils; to invade the rights of States rather than give them protection; to pull down and destroy rather than build up good government for a people who for ten long years have borne the weight of grievous burdens and are still struggling to clothe themselves anew with the garments of their former prosperity.

This bill is reported by a committee appointed by resolution of the House to investigate certain matters in the State of Alabama; but, sir, it did not have its origin in that committee. The chairman [Mr. COBURN] before he began his opening argument in support of the bill conceded as much, when, in reply to the question put by me, he admitted that, in point of time, the bill was framed prior to his report on Alabama affairs. The bill was draughted and agreed upon in party caucus before the committee had summed up, sifted, and weighed the vast amount of testimony in the case, before the unjust, illogical, not to say libelous and malicious conclusions were deduced as unblushingly appear in the extraordinary report accompanying the bill. The report was made "to fit the bill," and not the bill to fit the facts disclosed by the investigation.

The testimony taken as a whole, and subjected to the tests usually applied by those in search of truth, would not warrant the unjust and insulting measures contained in this proposed legislation, even if Congress had the constitutional right to interfere with local self-government in the States.

I therefore repeat, sir, that this bill is not demanded by the necessities of the people of the South, either white or black. And I think I state it not too strongly when I say that it is the offspring of disappointed ambition, and has become the bantling of those politicians—not statesmen—who in the late elections were repudiated by their people, and were branded with the seal of public condemnation. It is a wonderful fact, sir, that the most active, zealous, and persistent advocates of this bill, in caucus and upon this floor, are those who have heard the rebuking voices of the people, and will soon have executed upon them the sentence of banishment from this Hall. It is still more wonderful that southern men, or those claiming to represent southern communities and southern interests, should by voice or vote invite fresh Federal aggression upon the rights of their States. But wonderful as it is, 'tis true!

I say it, Mr. Speaker, in no personal unkindness: Chiefest among those who not only invite but insist upon congressional interference with the municipal affairs of their own States, and would strengthen the arm of the executive with the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and thus strike down the great bulwark of liberty, is my colleague, [Mr. WHITE,] who claims to represent the whole State of Alabama.

The House will remember that long prior to the report of the committee my colleague had introduced in this House bills of a kindred nature; and if he has not been misrepresented by his own party press and friends, he is the author of the "caucus force bill" now under consideration. At all events, whether this transcendant honor (?) rightfully belongs to him or not, he has on another occasion, in substance, if not in words, declared that Congress had not yet done its whole duty in the work of southern reconstruction; that there is rebellion now in the State of Alabama against the laws and Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the long residence of my colleague in Alabama, his extensive acquaintance over the State, his reputation as an able lawyer, the high position he occupies as a member of the Judiciary Committee, his close alignment with the majority of this House, the party in power, all combine to give potency to whatever he may say, however unfounded and slanderous against his State his charges may be.

I deny, sir, that there is any rebellion in Alabama against the Constitution and laws of the United States. I deny that there is any disposition among the people of that State to interfere with the rights, privileges, and immunities of any citizen or class of citizens—white or black—guaranteed to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States. On the contrary, I affirm that Alabama accepted in good faith the results of the war. Her constitution has been declared by an American Congress to be republican in form, and her laws are in nowise in conflict with those of the United States. Her citizens who were lately in arms preserve their paroles with knightly honor, and the entire body of her people stand ready to give protection to life, liberty, and property. I say, sir, Alabama accepted the results of the war in good faith, and I desire to call your attention to some facts in support of this declaration.

Upon the surrender of the confederate armies the dominant power of the Government claimed the destruction of the institution of slavery as one of the necessary and logical results of the war.

As soon as President Johnson began his policy of reconstruction, Governor Parsons, as provisional governor of Alabama, issued his proclamation and called the people together in convention that they might blot out everything from their organic law which was inconsistent with the new order of things. They met, and by their ordinances demonstrated how truly they accepted the results of the war. My colleague [Mr. WHITE] was a member of that convention, and venomous and vindictive as he is now against the democratic party, and reckless as he shows himself to be when he declares—

There is rebellion now in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, deliberately and deeply concerted, widely extended, largely sympathized with in many other of the Southern States, and reaching through the democratic party to no small portion of the Western and Northern States; rebellion not in form against the Government of the United States, but rebellion against its laws and Constitution, and a determinate and fixed purpose manifested by open declaration and armed force to obstruct the operation of those laws and render them nugatory—nevertheless he stood in that convention almost solitary and alone in opposition to the ordinance abolishing slavery. But what a change has come over the spirit of his dream. In his celebrated "bonnie-blue-flag" speech, delivered on the floor of the convention September 20, 1865, filled with patriotic ardor, and possessed of political ken far above his fellow-members, he fervidly declared:

All hostile demonstrations on our part have ceased. The tens of thousands of youthful but veteran soldiers, who have scarce known any other avocation than war, or any other companionship than that of the camp, who, undismayed, have so often stood undaunted in death's wildest carnival, have turned to the peaceful pursuits of private life. No mutiny, no outbreak, scarce an act of violence within the borders of our State. Resistance has ceased on the part of our people; and all are awaiting the restoration of our political relations and a revival of those bonds of fellowship which once held together a united and happy people.

This appeal would, I doubt not, be satisfactory to the President and to the democratic party at the North, and in the sincere and earnest desire which influences them to reinstate the relations which formerly existed between the North and South would induce them to favor the admission of our representatives.

But this would not satisfy the radicals at the North, nor would the adoption of the ordinance proposed by the committee satisfy them. The agitation of the negro question has elevated them to power, and they are determined to continue that agitation to preserve power. It is to them the breath of life. Withdraw it, and the party dies. They declare that they have only half done their work when they have freed the negro; and they say they must now go on to place him upon a social and political equality with the white man. He must minister in our pulpits, sit on the judge's bench and in legislative halls, vote at the polls, sleep under our roof, eat at our boards, mingle in our social intercourse, and marry our daughters. This is the feast to which we are invited by the radicals of the North, and these are the men whom it is supposed that we shall propitiate by adopting the ordinance of the committee. Concession only invites aggression; and we might as well expect to appease the hunger of a starving wolf by throwing him a morsel as to appease radicals North with concessions less than their extremest demands. We should never forget that this party can never be satisfied—for if satisfied, the party would at once die.

Again, in that same speech he declares that—

The irrepressible conflict still goes on. * * * It will expand until it reaches the whole country, and the political problem whether the negro and his confreres shall rule the United States will sharpen and intensify until it culminates in a war of races and the extermination of the negro or the white man * * *

Who are our friends in this contest, and who are the friends of the country? I answer, those who, had we been faithful to our political pledges and adhered to our political principles, would have saved us and the country in 1860—the national democracy. After four years of separation; four years of national suffering and calamity; four years of battle and of bloodshed, when the clash of arms has ceased, and the clouds that intervened and obstructed our vision have passed away, we behold still proudly floating amid the ruins and desolation of war the banner of national democracy. They come to us not as conquerors but as protectors; not as enemies but as friends; not as strangers but as brothers; and they exhort us to come and unite with them to heal the wounds and bind up the bruises of our afflicted country; to maintain and preserve the principles of free government; to restore that Union which was the source of our power and our prosperity, and was once the pride of every true American; to restore it, not by power, and mere outward power, but to restore it in the hearts of the people.

What has the national democracy done in the last decade to drive my colleague from its banners "still proudly floating?" What has it done since he led the hosts of "southern democrats" against congressional reconstruction to merit his anathemas where once he sang its praises? Let others judge, I will not accuse.

But again:

For myself, I shall accept the proffers of reconciliation and restoration so generously and magnanimously tendered by the President and democratic party at the North. I am going to that old democratic flag and rally around it, and fight again for the great principles of popular liberty and free institutions.

It is to this party, and this party alone, that we are to look for aid and co-operation at the North and in Congress. They will be satisfied with our action in adopting the resolution I have proposed. It is the very language of the oaths and requirements which entitle us to citizenship, and fully embraces the official action of the Government of the United States, and pledges to it our good faith and our support. This is all that the radicals of the North can reasonably and justly demand of us. We have complied with the law and with the proclamations, and have pledged ourselves to abide by them, unless and until declared invalid by that tribunal to which the Constitution refers them—the Supreme Court of the United States. If so set aside, any man of intelligence knows that we would not be called upon nor could we sustain them if we would.

And yet again:

If we pass the ordinance of the committee abolishing slavery, we still have to go before an abolition Congress, and we have no assurance that our representatives will be allowed to take their seats. The committee should go further, if this is the object which is to be obtained, at any sacrifice. They should provide for negro suffrage, give him a right to hold office, to sit on juries—make him civilly the equal of the white man. Less than these will not satisfy the men with whom we have to deal, and without we concede all, the concession of any part will do us no good, but harm, in the concession made and harm in the moral influences of that concession.

* * * * * * *

A great people, overpowered after a gallant and noble resistance, bowing with dignity to the force they had not the power to resist, and bearing misfortune with patience and with fortitude, feeling that they are in the power of the conqueror, yet nobly declining to do anything which will inflict injury upon their country or tarnish their good name, would be a spectacle which not only should command respect, but would elicit the sympathy and admiration of a magnanimous nation; nor can the people of the North forget (now that we have ceased to fight) nor long overlook the fact that it is the Anglo-Saxon who is suffering here, and that it is their own blood and race whom the radicals North would subordinate, or at least bring down to a level with the negro.

My colleague, sir, in that same speech, discussing the experiment of emancipation, said:

I believe the system impracticable, and that it will prove a confessed failure, even on the part of its warmest advocates.

And that—

The man who was born a slave, and has arrived at years of maturity as a slave, cannot be made a freeman. You may absolve him from the legal obligations of a slave; you may remove from him the power of the master, but you cannot relieve him from the power of habit, opinion, feeling, and principle.

Again:

The next highest characteristic of the negro is his improvidence. This has been strengthened by habit; his master has always provided for him food, clothing, a home, medicine and physician when sick. He never had to care for himself because he knew that his master would provide for him, but this only confirmed by habit his natural idleness, and made it a law of his being that he is unfitted, and will not take care of himself.

These qualities—idleness and improvidence—stimulate what may be regarded as his vice, theft; and as his wants press upon him, just so will his degradations multiply.

Now, sir, contemplate the future of four millions of human beings idle, improvident, and thievish, suddenly thrown upon their own responsibilities, and their own guidance, and tell me, if you can, the fate of that people—misery and want and ennui, degradation, prostitution, disease, and death.

In striking contrast with the views and opinions expressed on this floor by my colleague, he declared then:

The universal disposition of our people is to peace and harmony, and to reunion under the Constitution of our common country. This done and Alabama will acquiesce in the disposition which the Government has made and shall make of slavery.

But, Mr. Speaker, this series of extracts from my colleague's speech in 1865—the great speech of his life—would not be complete if the grand and eloquent peroration were omitted:

Mr. President, the bonnie blue flag no longer reflects the light of the morning sunbeam, or kisses with its silken folds the genial breezes of our southern clime. The hands that waved it along the fiery crest of a hundred battle-fields, and the hearts that for the love they bore it so often defied danger and death, no longer rally around it. Another banner waves in triumph over its closed and prostrate folds, but proud memories and glorious recollections cluster around it. Sir, I will refrain. The South needs no eulogy. The faithful record of her achievements will encircle her brow with glory bright and enduring as the diadem that crowns the night of her cloudless skies. The scenes of Marathon and Platæ have been re-enacted in the New World without the beneficent results which flow from those battle-fields of freedom, and our country lies prostrate at the feet of the conqueror. But dearer to me is she in this the hour of her humiliation than was she in the days of her pride and her power. Each blood-stained field, each track of devastation, each new-made grave of her sons fallen in her defense, each mutilated form of the confederate soldier—her widow's tear, her orphan's cry—are but so many cords that bind me to her in the hour of her desolation, and draw my affections closer around my stricken country. When I raise my voice or lift my hand against her, may the live thunder rive me where I stand! Though I be false in all else, I will be true to her. Though all others may prove faithless, I will be faithful still. When in obedience to the great command, "Dust to dust," my heart shall return to that earth from which it sprung, it shall sink into her bosom with the proud consciousness that it never knew one beat not in unison with the honor, the interests, the glory of my country.

Electrified, as was that convention, by the burning words and eloquent appeal of my colleague, the ordinance abolishing slavery was adopted, demonstrating, as far as this act could show, that Alabama accepted in good faith the results of the war.

Mr. Speaker, I have conjured up "the pale ghost" of my colleague's former speech in order that the House and the country may contrast its sentiments then with his utterances recently made upon this floor.

In the RECORD of February 10 my colleague in discussing the civil-rights bill declared:

The war of the democratic party in the South (for there is no national democracy there) has been from the beginning upon negro suffrage. This was the bulwark against which their artillery was directed, and all other points or modes of attack were but incidental and accessorial to this main object.

* * * * * * *

When in 1868 Mr. Blair wrote his celebrated letter declaring the reconstruction measures of Congress "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void," he sounded the key-note of southern democratic policy, the central idea of their party aims, and the governing principle of all their movements, the fruitful source of our political troubles in the South since the war, and destined in the coming years to swell into the trumpet-call to another rebellion more formidable both in its moral antagonisms and its physical proportions than that from which the nation has been recently delivered. War upon negro suffrage; war upon the Constitution and laws which confer political rights upon the colored people—these have been the battle-cry which has heated and inflamed the southern mind up to the point of a war of races, and now it is war upon the negro, openly declared, defiantly and bitterly prosecuted, upon the avowal by the democrats themselves that it is a war of extermination.

While these charges are not true, it may be an interesting fact for the House to know, that when in 1868, the American Congress proposed to force upon the State of Alabama a constitution against the will of her people, my colleague was then utterly opposed to the reconstruction measures, and his white plume waved in the forefront of that political battle. He was then in favor of white supremacy and the preservation of State governments. He was the author of the address "to the people of Alabama" advising them to abstain from voting, and thus by non-action defeat the proposed constitution. In that address he said:

We are the lawful voters of the State; our right, the proud heritage of the white race, is guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Alabama. The reconstruction acts of Congress propose to take this right from many of the white race, and to confer it upon the black race. Thus, in both directions, usurping power, subverting the State governments, making them mere dependencies upon congressional sufferance, and upheaving from their foundations all constitutions, both State and Federal, and overturning the governments which are built upon them.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, my colleague, for the sake of hoped-for party triumph, would forget "the proud heritage of the white race," would pass this bill and have the Federal Government "usurp power" which belongs alone to the States, convert sovereignties into "mere dependencies upon congressional sufferance," and place his own "Caucasian blood" under the power and dominion of the ignorant negro and his unscrupulous and adventurous allies. Fie upon such consistency! Out upon such patriotism! Away with such statesmanship!

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak more directly to the report of the committee. The majority of the committee seem to have started out in their investigation with the idea that murder and bloodshed was the rule, and protection to life was the exception in Alabama; that law and order was confined to the few and that oppression of the negro was the chief occupation of our people; that democrats alone intimidated republicans; that the "white man's party" determined "to carry the election at all hazards," and that they resorted to every species of intimidation, violence, and ostracism that would conduce to that result. Hence their conclusion that the last election in Alabama was carried by intimidation, fraud, and violence upon the part of Democrats, and hence the necessity for this bill. By the testimony of interested parties, many of whom are wholly unreliable and corrupt, individuals are intimidated; therefore whole States must be punished and robbed of their right to punish offenders in their own way within their own borders—"the hundred" must suffer the punishment due to but one. Such is the logic of the committee.

In reply to the malignant charges against the democracy of Alabama founded upon the testimony of irresponsible partisans, I shall content myself with quoting the following extract from the address of the democratic State executive committee to the people of the United States as showing the animus of those to whom the whole canvass had been intrusted, and also the statements made under oath by such men as Governor Houston, Ex-Governor Watts, Chief Justice Brickell, and others; men of exalted character and thoroughly reliable in every respect; men whose simple statements would outweigh the sworn testimony of a thousand vile traducers:

Address of the democratic and conservative State executive committee.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, October 1, 1874.

To the people of the United States:

The undersigned, the executive committee of the democratic and conservative party of Alabama, address you for the purpose of repelling the slanders circulated against the good people of this State for political purposes. That you may fully understand our position and that of the party we represent, we state:

First. That we were selectd as the executive committee of our party in a full convention assembled here on the 29th day of July last, and thus we are the legitimate representatives of our party.

Second. That the republican or radical party in Alabama is composed of about nine-tenths negroes and one-tenth whites.

Third. That the democratic and conservative party is composed almost exclusively of the white people of the State, embracing a majority of the people.

Fourth. That to show the spirit which governed and now governs our party, we quote a paragraph from the address of our executive committee issued on the 27th day of August, 1874:

"We especially urge upon you carefully to avoid all injuries to others while you are attempting to preserve your own rights. Let peace not only prevail, but let our people avoid all just cause of complaint. Turmoil and strife with those who oppose us in this contest will only weaken the moral force of our efforts. Let us avoid all personal conflicts; and if these should be forced upon us, let us only act in that line of just self-defense which is recognized and provided for by the laws of the land. We could not please our enemies better than by becoming parties to conflicts of violence and thus furnish them plausible pretexts for asking the interference of Federal power in our domestic affairs. Let us so act that all shall see, and that all whose opinions are entitled to any respect shall admit that ours is a party of peace, and that we only seek to preserve our rights and liberties by the peaceful but efficient power of the ballot-box."

Among other things the following is found in the testimony of Governor Houston:

GEORGE S. HOUSTON, a witness for the minority, sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. Are you the present governor of this State?
Answer. I am.
Q. Are you well acquainted in the State of Alabama?
A. I think so.
Q. How long have you resided in Alabama?
A. For the last fifty years.
Q. Do you know of any intimidation being used by the white democrats toward the colored republicans during the last campaign to prevent the free right of suffrage on the part of colored men?
A. None at all.
Q. Do you know of any disposition on the part of white democrats of this State to intimidate or to prevent colored men from exercising the free right of franchise?
A. I have been at consultations with my own political friends in relation to the election, and the universal sentiment, as far as it ever transpired before me and as it ever reached me through any channel whatever, was that the election should be free and fair and entirely devoid of any effort to improperly control votes by intimidation or otherwise on the part of democrats.
Q. Do you know of any intimidation on the part of republicans toward voters in this State, from your own personal knowledge or from information?
A. I know this partly from my own knowledge, by which I mean derived from the voters themselves. Various colored voters in my county, on the day of the election, and some before and some since, have come to me and desired to vote the democratic ticket. They have told me that they were threatened with ostracism and with violence if they did it, first by the leading negro voters, and then by white men who were passing through the country pretending to be deputy marshals; and they said that a squad of soldiers which was in Limestone County did the same thing. A negro man whom I raised from a child, who has lived with me all his life, and does yet, was very warmly disposed to me, came to my son before the election crying like a child, and said that he would be glad if my son would agree for him not to go to the election; that he had been afraid if he went that he would have to leave the country; that they would not allow him to live in the country if he went and voted for a democrat. I had them crying to me in their conversation, and begging not to be required to vote. In every instance we have told them to take their own course.

Q. Is it not the desire of the democratic party of the State of Alabama that every man shall enjoy the free right of suffrage, irrespective of color?

A. As far as I know it is universally the case, and I think my information is as extensive as any man's in the State, for I was actively in the canvass the whole time. I have in all my speeches, in the presence of the military and out of their presence, everywhere, told the negroes that they had the right to vote as they pleased, and that I would protect them in that right. I told them if they wanted to vote against me they should do it, and if anybody went to interfere with them for voting against the democrats, I would be one of the leading men to protect them in their right of voting. I have told them that in my speeches all over the State; and if they did not want to vote for me I did not want them to. The other speakers with whom I canvassed, I think, very universally took the same course.

Q. From your general and thorough knowledge of the people of the State of Alabama, was there any necessity for Federal interference at the last election in this State, either by civil or military?

A. None in the world. There was no point, in my judgment, and certainly no point with which I am acquainted, where there was any purpose to interfere with the negroes voting as they pleased. We of course intended to try to get the negro vote if we could do it fairly. Those who canvassed with me, and I always in my speeches, have been particular to tell the people, black and white, and especially the negroes, and explain to them, that nobody had a right to control their vote but themselves, and to vote as they pleased.

Q. It has been testified before this committee that a fair election cannot be had in Alabama without Federal interference. Is such the case or not?

A. It is not true.

Q. It has also been testified before our committee that a State government cannot be maintained here without Federal interference. Is such the case?

A. I think not. I have no earthly fear about maintaining the government, and quietly doing it, because I intend to enforce the law fairly in every case, as well for the negro or for the republican as for the democrat.

Q. Is it not the wish and desire of the democracy of this State, and of the law-abiding people of this State, that there shall be free elections, and that every man shall go to the polls and vote according to the dictates of his own conscience?

A. Such is the intention, so far as I know anything about it; and I have no doubt it is the intention of the democratic party as a party.

Q. Do you know of any disposition on the part of the democratic party, the white men of the State of Alabama, to deprive the colored man of the right of suffrage?

A. None in the world; and I do not believe that there is any such desire or purpose, either by law or otherwise.

Q. Are not the white democrats of Alabama opposed to interfering with the right of suffrage, but to accept the situation as it is, so far as the right of suffrage is concerned, and to enforce the law in that respect and allow every man to vote as he pleases?

A. That is my understanding, and that is my position as governor of the State, which I have expressed to the Legislature freely and fully, and which, in all likelihood, I will express in the message. I am opposed to any interference with the right of voting as it now stands. I desire a law to be passed which will secure to every man the right to vote; but I desire such restrictions to be put around it as will prevent double voting, or repeating, as it is called, in some localities in our State.

Q. Then you, as governor of the State, intend that the negro shall enjoy any right that any man can enjoy under law; that is, being protected in his right of suffrage, to have his children educated so far as the school fund may go; in other words, to protect him in all the rights of a good citizen?

A. That is my purpose, and I have no doubt that is the purpose of the leading and good citizens of the State. This very point was expressly given by me in my inaugural address, not for buncombe but as a truth, because I intend to do as therein expressed.

Q. There has been some trouble in this State during the last canvass. Do you know the source or cause of that trouble?

A. I do not know to what trouble you refer.

Q. I refer to those negro riots in which some blood was shed.

A. We have none in North Alabama that I now remember. Those in South Alabama I am less acquainted with. I will say that the republican negroes are very tyrannical and severe upon any negro who they think intends to vote the democratic ticket; they are very overbearing to other negroes who are not protected by the public sentiment of the locality, and by the white man. I have no doubt that there would be a great amount of violence used on the part of the leading blacks toward those who are disposed to vote the democratic ticket. There is a degree of tyranny that is unequaled, in my judgment, and it is exerted everywhere, as far as I have heard.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You have testified that there was no intimidation so far as you knew on the part of democrats as against republicans in this State, I believe?

A. Yes, sir; particularly negroes, although I am willing to let you say republicans.

Q. Have you never heard an instance of intimidations of that kind?

A. I have heard of these Sumter County difficulties. I have heard of no other intimidations. I may have heard other reports.

Q. You seem to have heard only of intimidation of one side?

A. I seem to have heard as much on one side as the other, if it ever came to me.

Q. Have you ever heard of voters being intimidated at a place called Eufaula by the firing of guns on the election day into a crowd of voters that were there?

A. I heard of a riot at Eufaula, but the version I had of that was not a version of intimidation. The version I heard of it was that the negroes commenced the firing; whether that is true, I do not know; I was not there.

Q. Did you never hear that the democrats commenced the firing?

A. It is possible I have, but I do not remember.

Q. You said that the democrats in this State were in favor of educating negroes. Have you provided for a system of common schools for the negroes in Alabama?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. To what extent?

A. To the same extent that we have for the whites. I do not remember the precise amount of money—perfect equality.

Q. Have you separate schools, or do they go to school together?

A. Separate schools; but the same amount pro rata to a negro child as to a white child.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Is not the proposition seriously discussed in the democratic Legislature not to make an appropriation for school purposes, but to take the money in lieu thereof and pay the interest on the public debt?

A. There was no such proposition in the Legislature, and no such position assumed by the democratic members of either house.

Chief Justice ROBERT C. BRICKLE sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. What is your business?

Answer. I am at present chief justice of the supreme court of the State.

Q. Are you well acquainted in the State of Alabama?

A. My acquaintance in the northern part of the State is very extensive. I was born and have lived there all my life. In the southern part of the State it is more limited, but I have a general acquaintance throughout the State.

Q. Do you know of any intimidation being used by white democrats during the last general election to intimidate colored voters, preventing their voting the republican ticket or any other ticket?

A. I know of none whatever. In the section of country in which I live I know there was none. It is proper for me to state in that connection that I heard several political speeches during the last canvass, made by democrats, and when there were a large number of colored persons present. They invariably assured them that they should have the right to vote as they pleased; that they would be protected by the democrats in voting as they pleased.

Q. Is it the wish and desire of the white democrats resident of Alabama, so far as you know, that the colored people shall have the free right of franchise, exercising it according to the dictates of their own conscience?

A. We desire that they shall have it as it is secured to them by the Constitution and laws, and that they shall exercise it as freely as we exercise it.

Q. Do you, as judge of the supreme court, and from your information and knowledge of the several courts of the State, believe that a colored man can receive the same measure of justice at the hands of the courts of this State that a white man can?

A. I am sure that they will.

Q. Do you believe that a fair and impartial election can be held in Alabama without intervention of the Federal authority, civil or military?

A. Yes, sir. I am satisfied that there can be. The last election, in my opinion, was the most orderly, quiet, and fair that we have had at any time since the days of reconstruction, and it was more like an election of the old time than any election we have had since the war.

The sub-committee here adjourned to meet at Eufaula.

The following is an extract from the testimony of Ex-Governor Watts:

Question. Do you know of any intimidation being used by white democrats to prevent colored republicans from exercising the free right of franchise during the last campaign, or at the November election?

Answer. I know of none such.

Q. Was it or was it not the desire of the democrats in the State of Alabama at the election in November to have a fair and quiet election, and allow every man to vote according to the dictates of his own conscience?

A. It was. The executive committee of the democratic party issued an address, which was written about the 26th of August. That address was written by myself. It expressed, as far as I am capable of judging, the sentiments that actuated the democratic party in that canvass.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the testimony of the governor of the State and the chief justice of the supreme court and Ex-Governor Watts. Their statements are corroborated by many other leading citizens in different portions of the State, whose statements will be found in the published testimony, and which I regret I cannot embody in these remarks.

With these facts before us, where is the necessity for Federal interference? Where the necessity of granting power to the President to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in times of profound peace?

But the committee say that murders and assassinations have been committed in Alabama—that Billings and Ivey were killed. This is true; but murders and assassinations are committed in all the States, North as well as South. In the crowded cities of the North as well as in the rural districts, in times of high political excitement as well as in times of profoundest quiet, men and women are killed; some are murdered in cold blood for gain, others assassinated for revenge of some fancied or real wrong; while in some localities in which the killing of a negro down South, whatever might be the cause or provocation, would cause the good people to raise their hands in holy horror; according to medical statistics crimes unmentionable, but shocking to decency, good morals, and humanity, are committed with impunity in the broad sunlight of an advanced civilization. And yet no one ever thought before of assassinating whole States because of the crimes of a few reckless, lawless, vicious individuals.

I venture the assertion that crime is as promptly punished in Alabama as in the States whence the gentlemen of the committee come, and there is as little resistance to the laws and authority of the General Government in Alabama as in any State in this broad Union. Is it possible that gentlemen who favor this bill desire to re-enact the scenes of 1872, when the State was wrested from the short-lived control of the democracy and handed over to the republicans by a pretended execution of Federal enforcement laws and by judicial intimidation? Parties were frequently arrested on "trumped-up" charges, and only released upon assurances of fidelity to the republican party. Many were tried, convicted, and suffered a felon's punishment upon the suborned testimony of party pimps, and yet there was no resistance! Since reconstruction no Federal officer has been obstructed in the discharge of duty, and no Federal court has failed to punish parties charged with crime except in cases where the court itself stood back aghast at the villainy of the accusation.

In our State courts parties are tried by the same law "without regard to race, color, or previous condition," and under the law and evidence punishment is meted out according to the magnitude of the offense.

But, say the committee, you persecute the negro and drive him from employment when he votes the republican ticket; and to the northern man you give no hand of welcome, but drive him and his family into social and business ostracism. Neither charge is true. In a few isolated cases the negro laborer, filled with freedom, who neglects his work and devotes his time to politics, may lose his place; but such a charge comes with bad grace from members of a party who drive white men from their navy-yards and workshops, their Government offices and places of lower grade, merely because they are democrats and their places are wanted for subservient partisans.

In regard to the latter charge—unkindness toward and ostracism of northern men—I submit the following extract from a letter directed to me by Hon. Reuben Chapman, a man honored in Alabama, and who for many years was well and favorably known within these walls.

Speaking of northern men who reside in the county of his residence, he says:

HUNTSVILLE, ALABAMA, February 11, 1875.

MY DEAR SIR: * * * I am very certain, from what they tell me and from what they have certified heretofore in reference to reported outrages on northern men, that they will sustain me in asserting that there is no foundation for such reports. They will state that within their experience and observation northern men are treated by native southerners, commercially and socially, with all the respect and encouragement as if they were "to the manor born." There has been no outbreaks in this section for years past. Last fall, about the time of our agricultural fair, the northern men around here held a meeting in regard to particular outrages of this sort, falsely reported. They passed resolutions on the subject, which I am told (I was then absent) were printed and a copy sent to the United States Attorney-General. If I can find a copy I will send it to you. The truth is that, in this section of our State, at least, the citizens are orderly, law-abiding and peaceable to a degree that cannot be excelled by any community, either North or South, in the United States.

Yours, with great respect,

R. CHAPMAN.

Hon. JOHN H. CALDWELL, Washington City.

In this connection I submit the following circular, a copy of which was addressed to the Atttorney-General. It shows how a Federal officer can busy himself in maligning a southern community, and what is true of him is true of many others:

Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General of the United States:

We, the undersigned, northern men, now citizens of Madison County, State of Alabama, (belonging some of us to the republican and some to the democratic parties,) earnestly protest against the truthfulness of the reports recently forwarded to you by Z. E. Thomas, United States marshal for the northern district of Alabama. We are constrained to believe that they were made solely for political purposes and to injure this community abroad. We live in various parts of the county, and this statement contains the individual knowledge of each of us. We know that no disturbances of the kind mentioned by Mr. Thomas could have transpired without that fact being known to some one of us. We state that no such disturbances are within our knowledge, and we are sure that none such have occurred. We know that republican meetings, both night and day, have been held all over this county during the pending political canvass, and no disturbances nor attempt at disturbance have occurred at any one of them. We are property-holders, and feel deeply interested in the welfare of the county. Some of us take an active interest in politics, and we feel as safe in doing so, both in our person and property, as if we lived in Massachusetts or New York. We have no objection to the presence of Federal troops in our midst—they are generally well-behaved and orderly, and always bring money into the country—but the impression sought to be conveyed by Mr. Thomas, that their presence is necessary to protect republicans from insult or danger, in the expression of their opinions or the exercise of their privileges, is a libel upon the community, and Mr. Thomas should either be required to support them by proof or he should be removed from office as unworthy of trust.

The statements of this man Thomas, which are denounced in the foregoing circular, together with a letter from a colored politician, W. H. Council, are paraded in the testimony of the committee, and will doubtless be quoted as "confirmations strong as proofs of holy writ" of outrages committed in North Alabama against the poor unoffending negro. Let the declarations of northern republicans and northern democrats, adopted sons of Alabama, be their refutation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the South needs kind words, forgetfulness of the past, forbearance, not force bills. She wants peace. "There is a road to peace;" and "I tell you there is but one road," one way by which we may return to the better days of the Republic. The bitterness of hate engendered by bloody war must be forever consigned to oblivion. We must cultivate the memories and virtues of those who bequeathed to us the blessed heritage of which we boast. We must frown upon the wild clamors of fanatics who feed and fatten upon turmoil and strife. The Southern States, as formerly, must be recognized as coequal with the States of the North. The southern man must be recognized as the peer of any other American citizen, either North, or East, or West. There must be no distrust about our pledges. You must believe us when we tell you we have accepted the situation in good faith. You must treat us as brothers, and not as strangers; friends, and not as aliens. The Federal Government must move in its sphere of delegated powers; the State government must exercise only its reserved rights. You must restore to us what you claim and exercise for yourselves North—local self-government. Goad us no longer with the bayonet—

"Remove the sword,
States can be saved without it!"

Do this, and we will begin with a hearty good-will the work of our regeneration. The spirit of our people will revive under assured reconciliation. Our fields, made desolate by the rude hand of war, will again blossom as the rose. The rich products of our soil increased, the vast mineral wealth of our section developed, will give new life to the paralyzed industries of the North. The whir and hum and din of the northern factories and workshops will be echoed back by the merry song of content, and the long, loud shout of joy from the fields and mining regions of the South. There will be neither cry of "bread" nor "blood." Heartily reunited by mutual concessions and forbearance, the two sections no longer divided, hand in hand will move on in the fulfillment of their destiny in the unity of a happy and prosperous people.

Civil Rights.

SPEECH OF HON. J. AMBLER SMITH,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that even as a party man I cannot yield my support to this bill, and I have to ask that I be allowed to assign the reasons that prompt me to oppose it.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this Government of ours, which is the emanation of the profoundest political wisdom, is not one of absolute power, that is, not in all things supreme; that it is not a consolidation or centralism, else why and whence that provision of the Constitution which declares that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Then there are some powers which the Government of the United States cannot exercise, and, as a consequence, there are some left to the States which they can rightfully exercise independently and exclusively of the Government of the United States.

Then the Federal Government is not supreme in all things. It is, under the Federal Constitution, as our fathers framed it, a limited government, confined within certain limits of concession and prohibition, while there is a vast mass of residuary power belonging to the States, as States, which no exercise of Federal authority can invade without trenching on the domain of the rights of the States, and departing from the fundamental philosophy of our free institutions.

There is, then, a dividing line between the powers of the two branches of our system. Where is that line? Sir, it is in that life-giving and life-preserving principle of the Constitution that the States, as States, have the right to manage their own domestic affairs in their own way, according to their own free sovereign will and pleasure.

Now, it seems to me that each and every provision of this bill infringes this elementary principle of our Federal system which has been held sacred from the very foundation of the Government, and which has been upheld by our supreme national judiciary up to the present hour. It treads with profane step upon that great residuary mass of State rights and reserved authority, which is our only bulwark of defense against consolidation and centralism.

The question is, what are the domestic internal concerns that stand above the reach of Federal authority? Sir, on this point we have had numerous judicial expositions that save us from groping in the dark. The boundaries of power may not be defined with absolute precision, but there is an approximation which is adequate to all purposes of practical solution. To use a general denomination, it is what is called the police power.

Say the Supreme Court in its opinion in the Slaughter-house cases:

This power is, and must be, from its very nature, incapable of any very exact definition or limitation. Upon it depends the security of social order, the life and health of the citizen, the comfort of an existence in a thickly populated community, the enjoyment of private and social life, and the beneficial use of property. It extends (says an eminent judge) to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the State; and persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State. Of the perfect right of the Legislature [referring to the Legislature of Louisiana] to do this no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned, (16 Wallace, 70 et seq.)

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton, 203,) in speaking of the numerous inspection laws passed by the States, describes similarly the scope of this police and reserved power of the States:

They (the inspection laws) form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which controls everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, all which can be most advantageously done by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State and those which respect turnpike-roads, ferries, &c., are component parts. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

Now, can we not find in this broad domain of police and reserved power a right for each State to regulate and control its schools, churches, hotels, public conveyances, theaters, and other places of public amusement, which are the subjects of this bill? Are not this State regulation and control necessary to the "security of social order; to the enjoyment of private and social life; to the beneficial use of property," referred to in the opinion of the court?

Sir, there is one test which conclusively settles that, over the local State objects of schools, inns, churches, public conveyances, theaters, and the like, the States, as States, have exclusive power of regulation, and of course that the Federal Government has none.

In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, already referred to, it is laid down that there is an immense mass of legislation that controls everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, and "that where no direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, consequently they remain subject to State legislation."

Now, has any jurisdiction over those objects been conferred on Congress? If there has been, then there is an end of the question. But if there has not been, (and there has not,) all authority remains with the States, to be exercised, by their legislation, for the comfort, quiet, enjoyment, and profit of their citizens.

Sir, it is clear to my mind that just what right the Legislature of Louisiana had to establish and regulate the slaughter-houses as a sanitary or police regulation, that same right has the State of Virginia, to take her for an example, to take charge of and regulate her hotels, public conveyances, theaters, and other places of public amusement. The principle is identical, and therefore the civil-rights bill before us is not in accordance with the Constitution. It contravenes elementary rights of domestic and local government which the States have exercised without question from the foundation of the Federal Government, certainly to the date of the new amendments.

And this brings up the question, Do these amendments oust the States of their ancient and precious jurisdiction in this regard, and transfer it to the General Government?

The advocates of this measure claim the power to enact it chiefly from that portion of the fourteenth amendment which says that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," though they also rely on the spirit at least of the thirteenth and fifteenth amendments.

But it so happens that the Supreme Court has decided in the Slaughter-house case, in terms most explicit and unmistakable, that the power to pass this bill cannot be derived from that source. The court seem to have viewed the subject in every possible phase, and, after showing that "there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual," the court ruled that it is only the "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States" that are placed by this clause (of article 14) under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, (privileges and immunities of citizens of a State,) whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment," (of article 14.) The court say:

> If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizens of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have hitherto rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

So that the ancient and sacred privileges and immunities which Justice Washington, in Corrifield vs. Corryell, 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, page 371, denominated "fundamental, which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several States which compose this Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign," have been neither added to nor subtracted from by the new constitutional amendments. They remain in all their original integrity and glory; and if the decisions of the Supreme Court shall continue to be respected as the highest of American law, they will continue to be beacon-lights to warn us against centralization and national disturbance.

Say the court in the Slaughter-house case, page 77:

> It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretension was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States; such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligations of contracts. But, with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

These are words of true wisdom and genuine statesmanship, which should be written in letters of gold over the lintel of every American door, ever and anon to remind the American people of their duty and interest in preserving the just and only safe relations between the General Government and the States.

I think I have shown, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is clearly violative of the Constitution; and we ought not to pass it.

And now, sir, let us apply a little common sense to the subject.

I own, say, a hotel in Richmond, Virginia; I have invested my capital in it, furnished it, paid the license and other taxes required by the laws of the State, have made it a pleasant resting place for the traveler and the permanent boarder, secured for it, by pleasing the public, a custom which furnishes my family an adequate living. It is my property, acquired by the labor of my hands and the sweat of my brow. But all at once I am told by the General Government, through its laws, that I must admit to my tables, to my drawing-room and parlors, to my bed-rooms and bedding, all colored people, however ignorant, filthy, and depraved, that choose to come to my establishment, and that if I do not I shall pay to the excluded party $500, and shall be fined from $500 to $1,000, and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than a year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask in all seriousness, where is the boasted right of property, what becomes of its sanctity, if any human power, even that of my own State, can prescribe to me whom I shall admit to my hotel and whom I shall exclude? Suppose in the state of society at Richmond and the tastes of the people my hotel is deserted and my income vanished by the intermingling side by side of white and colored guests? Where, then, is that "enjoyment of private and social life and the beneficial use of property, and the protection of the comfort and quiet of all persons and of all property" which are referred to in the opinion of the court in the Slaughter-house cases as the fundamental rights of the citizens of the States? They are shadows only.

Sir, I hold that the right of property is so sacred that the Legislature of my State itself cannot dare to say to me, though one of her citizens; that I shall not decide for myself whom I shall admit to and whom I shall exclude from my hotel. The assumption would be an impudent, unendurable usurpation and tyranny. No man in Virginia would own a hotel under such circumstances of outrage and degradation, and no white person in my State, man or woman, boy or girl, would respect such owner.

And so, sir, of my stage-coach, my steamboat, my theater—they are my property; and my State, much power as she has wrapped up in that great mass of reserved right, pertaining to herself and each of her sisters, cannot interfere with that property so long as I do not allow it to be a nuisance and to damage the public. If this be not so, then property, instead of being one of the great elements of society and a propulsion of honorable ambition and patriotic enterprise, would be a worthless bauble.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot sufficiently admire the reasoning and decision of an Ohio judge in a recent case, of which the facts are the following:

> On the 11th of February, 1873, Mr. Gardiner, a colored man, bought a ticket admitting to the dress circle or parquet, but was prevented from taking a seat by the ushers, and requested to leave that part of the house, on the understanding that his money be returned. Gardiner left, but brought suit under the civil-rights act against Manager Ellsler. Judge Griswold, of the superior court, in his charge to the jury, stated in effect that a theater was a private establishment, and that a manager had a right to exclude whomsoever he pleased from it. The civil-rights act, he stated in his charge, has no application whatever in this case.
> "This plaintiff has a right to bring a suit for a breach of contract in reference to admission to the theater as if he were a white person. But every man has the right to use his own property as he sees fit, so that he does not injure the person or property of others."
> In the conduct of one's own business a man is not bound to consult the feelings or tastes of others. He has no right to injure their persons or character or property. So long as he does not do them wrongs or commit nuisance he may conduct his own business in just such a manner and on just such rules as he sees fit. This right appertains as well to white as black. It is conceded that Mr. Ellsler conducts the Academy of Music for his own private gain; and if he sees fit, in the management of his business, to provide and establish a rule that no person of color shall be allowed to enter the "dress circle," and he enforces this rule, it is no ground for any action against him by such person. Mr. Gardiner, the plaintiff, might establish a theater, and if he saw fit he could establish a rule that no white person should be permitted to enter the dress circle or any other portion of the house.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

It seems to me, sir, that the strong common sense of this Ohio judge amounts to a logic that will puzzle the advocates of this bill, and should drive them from its support.

And I am most happy, Mr. Speaker, to be able to add to this sound reasoning of Judge Griswold the sustaining opinion of an eminent jurist of my own State, Judge R. W. Hughes, judge of the eastern district of Virginia.

Judge Hughes, basing his opinion on the decision of the Supreme Court in the New Orleans Slaughter-house cases, held that—

> The Federal courts are justified in refusing to take cognizance of offenses committed in violation of those rights which belong to citizens only as citizens of particular States, and are derived from State laws, and therefore under the protection of State tribunals, and in confining their jurisdiction to cases which involve those rights which belong to persons peculiarly in their character of citizens of the United States.

But, sir, where is the necessity for passing this bill now? Is it not a precipitation of trouble? The Southern States have not as yet—my State certainly has not—passed any laws discriminating against the colored race. All is quiet and the acquiescence in the existing condition of things is general, no grumbling even except from a few who have been made discontented by the incitement of demagogue politicians. Why ruffle this placid surface? Why take excitement and strife "by the forelock?" When any of the States shall have passed discriminating laws against the colored citizens it will be time enough to pass a civil-rights bill. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

On this point I may quote to advantage the opinion of Judge Ballard, a United States district judge expressed in a Ku-Klux case in Kentucky:

That a Ku-Klux crime committed in Kentucky is a crime against the State of Kentucky and punishable by her laws, and that where there is no denial to any class of citizens in a State of the equal protection of the laws, or, in other words, where there is no respect of persons before the law, there is no color of justification in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution for interference by congressional legislation, and that such legislation must needs be inoperative and void.

As for any provision for mixed schools, as a friend of the colored race I am constrained to enter my most solemn protest against it.

Mr. Speaker, we have in fine progress in Virginia a system of public schools which bids fair to become one of the most admirable in the country. It is compulsory in its character, resting on the provision of our constitution which requires "its equal and full introduction into all the counties of the State by the year 1876."

The word "equal" has been construed to refer to the two races, and to mean that whatever provision is made for the instruction of the one race shall be made also for the other. And in the first act establishing the school system the Legislature provided that the schools for the two races should be "under the same general regulations as to management, usefulness, and efficiency."

Nearly a million dollars is raised annually by taxation for school purposes, of which the whites contribute more than 80 per cent., while the colored people come in for their full proportionate share of the benefits of the fund. Out of this fund schools have been already established in every county and city of the State for both whites and blacks, the schools being separate.

Each county and city has its superintendent of schools and other necessary officers, and under the auspices of Dr. Ruffner, the enlightened and able superintendent of public instruction, aided by his excellent assistants, the system has rapidly advanced in public favor, and, considering the short time it has been in operation, has attained extraordinary success. It may be said to be "in the full tide of successful experiment;" and unless some adverse occurrence shall arrest its march will eventually be a complete success, and become the supreme blessing of the State.

Now, sir, it is as manifest to me as the blazing sun that the introduction of mixed schools will utterly destroy this beautiful and interesting system, and cut off the colored people from all educational opportunities.

The local reports of the county and city superintendents to the board of education—those who must know most on the subject—give warning on this point by many expressions of opinion that the passage of a civil-rights law embracing the mixed-school provision "will be the instrument of inevitable destruction of our school system."

I beg to make a few quotations from these reports:

CAMPBELL COUNTY.

The friends of public education are gaining in number and growing in enthusiasm. The impending civil-rights bill has somewhat checked progress.

HANOVER.

The teachers report increasing favor and popularity. The threatened passage of what is known as the civil-rights bill has done more to retard our work and to weaken the hold of the schools upon the popular affection than all other causes combined. It has caused many of the stanchest friends of popular education to hold their tongues and abate their zeal. Let us remain free to govern the schools by our own laws, and give us money, and we will work out a glorious future for the public schools of Virginia.

KING WILLIAM.

There is an apathy on the subject which amounts to positive indifference; and during the time the civil-rights bill was before Congress, with a probability of its becoming the law of the land, a prejudice was excited which without doubt would have destroyed the whole system had the measure passed and an effort been made to enforce it. Apart from the fear of Federal intervention, the people very generally advocate a system of public education, and are looking to the time when Virginia will be left to manage her own affairs, to form a system of public education for the benefit of all her citizens which will be an honor to the State and a blessing to her people.

On the subject of education, I think there is a better feeling between the two races. The whites in all cases are willing to accord to the colored equal advantages of the system and perfect equality before the law.

LANCASTER AND NORTHUMBERLAND.

Public sentiment in some degree has varied during this scholastic year, owing to the vexed and unsettled question of civil rights. Since the failure to pass that bill through Congress, the sentiment of the community has become more calm, and a large majority of our cleverest and best population will sustain and uphold the free-school system.

LOUDOUN.

Our people were beginning to unite heartily with us in our labors, and our work would have progressed satisfactorily if the prospect of the disastrous consequences of the enforcement of the civil-rights bill had not warned them against further action. In several instances promised assistance was withdrawn, and our friends have relaxed their efforts in dread of the threatened suspension or destruction of our schools by congressional interference. If the people can feel any assurance that they will be permitted to carry into effect the plan submitted by the board of education without hinderance or molestation, the work will move onward; otherwise no progress will be made.

MECKLENBURGH.

I feel safe in saying that more would have been accomplished in the way of preparing school-houses but for the agitation in Congress of the civil-rights bill.

ROCKBRIDGE.

Public sentiment seems to have retrograded in Rockbridge in regard to the school system during the past year; no doubt owing to the agitation of the "civil-rights movement" in Congress. The people see very plainly how they may soon be forced to abandon the system of public schools entirely, or submit to its being made a means of social degradation and political oppression. Hence they are inclined to look with more or less suspicion on what seems to be fraught with so much danger. I hope, however, that the way will soon be open for renewed progress under the united efforts of all the friends of general education.

SCOTT.

Public sentiment is generally favorable. An earnest desire for longer sessions seems to be general. The agitation of the civil-rights bill is a drawback to its progress.

TAZEWELL.

The prospect at one time of the passage of the civil-rights bill developed the fact plainly that all parties in our county are warmly attached to our public school system. Both white and colored are opposed to the mixed schools. Our people say that, although we highly prize the benefits conferred by our free schools, let them go, if we are to have a mixture of races in them. Our supervisors have allowed us all the law permits. If our Legislature would be more liberal they would, I believe, be glad to allow tax enough to open schools sufficient for all our people.

CAMPBELL.

There has been but little change in public sentiment since my last report. The friends of public education are gaining in number and growing in enthusiasm. A few continue hostile, and as their ranks diminish their violence seems to increase. The impending civil-rights bill has somewhat checked progress.

ELIZABETH CITY AND WARWICK.

Public sentiment in these counties is decidedly in favor of public schools. The most substantial men in the community patronize them and manifest much interest in their success. It is, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the general desire of the colored population to have their schools remain, as at present, separate from the white schools; and it is, on the other hand, the universal determination of all the whites that the operation of the public-school system shall come to an end in these counties as soon as the civil-rights bill shall become a law.

Now, sir, who, after noting these, a few only of many warnings coming fresh from actual contact with the people, can find it in his heart to set back our noble system of public schools by enacting this civil-rights bill? Particularly how can any real friend of the poor, long trodden-down colored race assist in this calamitous result?

Governor Kemper, too, has raised a warning voice, by declaring his opinion that the passage of the civil-rights bill will at once arrest all appropriations for the schools. Whence, then, will a ray of light come to the colored man?

But the most impressive, might I not say most awful, admonition is that which comes from Dr. Ruffner, by birth a Virginian, and a devoted advocate of the education of the colored man, I believe, which is as follows:

The principles involved in this bill are wide-reaching, and on their right settlement hangs the life of southern civilization, if not the preservation of American liberty. If the school systems of the South be overthrown, the last germ of recuperative energy will have been destroyed; and if the principle be once established that the educational commonwealths of America are to be ruled by a central authority, education becomes the tool of power, and the enslavement of the people must logically follow.

The question of constitutional law involved in the civil-rights bill does not fall within my province; but if it be in accordance with our federative system for the details of State school classification and government to be regulated by Congress, the friends of true education may well pause before they commit themselves further in the direction of public schools. An educational system which is not free in its methods and which does not develop the people into that mental freedom which is the aim of all true education is a fraud.

I have strong confidence that this heaviest of the blows will not descend upon us while we in the South are now staggering under other burdens which of themselves may crush us. After all the marshaling of facts which has been going on for a twelvemonth past it must be generally known that the admixture of whites and blacks in southern schools is simply impossible. The most obvious reason for this is the social disparity, indeed the intense social repugnance, existing between the races, a repugnance far greater than that existing in ordinary society, even where the social scale is longest and its degrees most deeply graven. This repugnance between the free-born and free-made classes has been shown by reference to history from the earliest times to be an invariable law of society, the operation of which could not be overcome by argument, by statute, or by force. And it has been asserted, though not as fully developed as the subject deserves, that this social repugnance, like social laws generally, has a psychological basis which amply vindicates the law, and consequently that it asserts its power as clearly, though not as strongly, in the case of a community of race between the freedmen and their former masters as where there is diversity; and in the case of equality as well as inequality of culture, as has been particularly shown by reference to society in the Jewish commonwealth and in the Greek and Roman republics, to which might be added the entire social history of Europe. But to this general law in our States there have been added intensifying influences of the strongest character, namely, a wide difference of race and a terrible war. So that altogether we have one of the most aggravated cases known to history of social repugnance between two peoples inhabiting the same territory.

For all practical purposes we need not go beyond the fact of this repugnance in arranging the details of public education. We must teach the races in separate schools, or we must abandon public education. Here then is the sharp and decisive point: we will educate the blacks in separate schools, or we will not educate them at all.

Now, I will venture to say to the House that there is not in Virginia, nor in my opinion elsewhere, a man the superior in enlightenment and ability of Dr. Ruffner.

The few sentences I have quoted from his last report show him to be not only a profound thinker, but a Christian statesman, whose views may well challenge the admiration and seize the attention of Congress. And his last report on the school system of Virginia, taken all together, is a state paper worthy of the most eminent intellects of the Union. And would to God that that admirable paper could be scattered broadcast through the length and breadth of the land!

But, sir, I have yet other high authorities to quote.

At a national gathering in this city, during the past year, of the great Baptist denomination, and embodying a rare amount of denominational talent and Christian virtue, the opinion was expressed, rather quietly though firmly, that the cause of the education of the colored people of the South would be seriously embarrassed, if not totally annihilated, by any attempt on the part of the Federal Government to force mixed schools on the South.

Rev. Mr. Jeter, a great name in Virginia and not an unnational one, ventured to intimate the opinion that the forcing of mixed schools upon the South would utterly sacrifice the educational interests of the colored people; and Dr. Sears, a northern man and a gentleman, well known in educational connections—not a bigot, but a sensible, rational representative of the northern people, a citizen in the midst of the Virginia people, domiciled among them, and looking from a stand-point of practical observation—concurred with his distinguished Christian associate of the Old Dominion.

What has arrested the attention of these distinguished followers of the Cross may profitably claim the attention of the statesmen who are the temporal guardians of the moral weal of the nation.

I dare flatter myself, Mr. Speaker, that I have made it manifest that the passage of this civil-rights bill will have the effect of overthrowing the public-school system of Virginia—that noblest of all her moral enterprises—and will inevitably rule out the colored race from all educational chances. It will shut to them the door of the shool-house, for they have not the means to send their children to the private schools, and from necessity they must remain in the dark gloom of ignorance, while the means of the education of the whites will be materially diminished.

And now, sir, to apply again a little common sense. If after taxing our people a million a year, the white people paying nearly all the tax, ought we not to be allowed the poor privilege of regulating the manner and mode of expending the fund, more particularly when, as to the benefits of the expenditure, we make no discrimination against our colored fellow-citizens? And if Congress can intervene and prescribe to us in what way we shall administer our own school fund, in God's name, with what can it not interfere? What reserved right may it not sweep away? May it not take to itself the whole mass of police jurisdiction and reserved power which has been ever regarded by our thinking people as our main and, indeed, indispensable security against an absorbing centralization? If a State cannot manage her own schools as she chooses, great God, what can she do?

There is another provision of this bill to which I cannot and will not subscribe—that which provides what class of citizens shall be jurors in the State courts. It is an invasion of the right of the States to model their judiciary system as they please. What is a State but a province of the Federal Government if that Government can prescribe to it its judiciary system? And if Congress can dictate to a State as to her judicial system, why may it not interfere with her legislative and executive organizations?

Mr. Speaker, I do most religiously believe that the popular sentiment of the United States does not demand the passage of this bill. I do not think that the northern people care much about it. It is no concern of theirs. And if those who want to make political capital out of the subject would cease their efforts to deceive and mislead the dear people, and leave them to their own quiet judgment, they would never give the matter a passing thought.

In truth, it is much to be doubted whether the northern people care half as much about the poor negro as the southern. They (the northern people) made no haste to give the colored man the ballot until after the rebellion, when his vote became connected with considerations of party ascendency. In the few cases it did confer it, the privilege was coupled with either property or intellectual qualification, or both. Massachusetts required of the voter ability to read and write and prepayment of assessed taxes; and, if I recollect aright, Connecticut not very long since voted down negro suffrage, and Ohio did the same by sixty thousand majority.

Let us give the colored race all their just rights, secure them equality before the law as we have done, and see that they have the equal protection of the laws, and then leave them to their own good sense and reflection, and it will be all the better for them and for us all.

Sir, we have made the colored man a voter and a juror. To enable him to meet the responsibilities of his new relations to the public we must educate him. Not to do it is sheer cruelty—cruelty to the colored race, and cruelty to the white. Let us not by the passage of this bill fall short of our great duty to both races.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, and in justice to my constituents, I beg to make a brief reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who read to this House a letter which is as defamatory as it is unfounded in statement, and which it is my duty to expose.

During the discussion on the bill the gentleman from Massachusetts read from Richmond a malicious letter signed by Betty Huntington, a person claiming to live in Richmond. I have had a thorough search made, and find that no such person lives there. At the time the letter was read I pronounced it false in every particular. I print herewith letters from leading citizens of both parties. The first letter is from Major Patrick Hart, a man of sterling worth, who carries on his person wounds received in the Mexican war and in the late civil war, under the Stars and Stripes:

RICHMOND, February 8, 1875.

DEAR FRIEND: In answer to your note dated 6th instant, I have the honor to state that I have made extensive inquiry in regard to finding Betty Huntington, and cannot find her. I have seen Drs. Derrick and Mosley, and fully one hundred others, all colored. Each and every person I have spoken to on the subject pronounces the letter a forgery. I have seen Judges Guigon and White, and will see Judge Minor, of Henrico. There is not a doubt but the letter is forged, and its contents a wicked falsehood.

Yours, truly and fraternally,

Major PATRICK HART.

Hon. JOHN AMBLER SMITH.

The next letter was written by Judge Guigon, one of the ablest and most upright men who ever wore the judicial ermine. He is respected alike by all parties:

HUSTINGS COURT, CITY OF RICHMOND,
Richmond, February 8, 1875.

DEAR SIR: In relation to the letter read by General BUTLER, purporting to be written from this city, I have to say that, so far as my knowledge and information go, the statements of the letter are not only untrue but utterly without foundation.

I am the judge of the court before which such cases would come for trial, and none such has ever been tried by me or in my court. The only case I remember during my service of five years was that of a white man, an Italian, convicted of rape upon a white child, and he is now serving out his term of twenty years in the penitentiary.

I have also made inquiry as to the police justice's court and am informed that no such case has occurred there. Indeed, such a thing would be almost impossible. The police justice does not discharge parties charged with crime upon contradictory testimony or impeachment of witnesses, but sends such cases on for trial by a jury in my court; and the grand jury of this court is always open to hear such charges, though dismissed by the justice.

Offenses of this character are so repugnant to the feelings and sentiments of our people and would arouse so just an indignation that swift punishment would follow not only the perpetrators of the crime, but any officer who sought to screen them.

If there be any such case, I should like to be informed of it, in order that it may be punished, and you may as our Representative challenge its production.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. B. GUIGON.

Hon. J. AMBLER SMITH.

I desire to call special attention to the letter of Police Justice White, of Richmond, (whose judicial decisions were so bitterly assailed in this Huntington letter,) who has held that position for years, and has faithfully and ably discharged the duties of the office:

OFFICE OF POLICE JUSTICE,
Richmond, Va., February 8, 1875.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 6th instant, I have the honor to state that the assertions contained in a letter alleged to have been written to General BUTLER in December last by one Betty Huntington, are absolutely untrue. No such case has ever been before the police court. Two or three criminal actions for seduction have been instituted, the parties to which were all colored. I know of only one case—of a somewhat kindred character—in which a white man and a colored woman were involved, and that was a case of bastardy. The white man was then punished according to the law of this Commonwealth. I deem it useless to say to you that the laws of this city and State have always been administered in my court equably, as to all classes and colors. I repeat that no such case as that alluded to in the Huntington-Butler letter ever occurred in the police court of Richmond.

The whole thing is an abominable production of those whose malice to the South breeds trouble to the nation, and is calculated to injure those whom they arrogantly and mendaciously assume to protect.

Thanking you for your courtesy, I subscribe myself,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. J. WHITE,
Police Justice City of Richmond.

Hon. J. AMBLER SMITH.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that in no part of the Union do the white and black races live more peaceably than in Richmond, Virginia. I trust we shall have no more of these outrage stories.

Counting of Electoral Votes.

SPEECH OF HON. T. F. BAYARD,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 25, 1875,

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. No. 1251) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising theron—

Mr. BAYARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: From the foundation of the Government up to the year 1865 the American people had managed to conduct the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States without any other aid than the constitutional provision and a single statute that had been passed during the first presidential term of George Washington. In 1792, on the 1st of March, an act was passed "relative to the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the office both of President and Vice-President." One thing is observable in this act of Congress, as in all acts of that period of our country's history, that great care was taken to assume no power not distinctly granted or necessarily implied by the terms of the Federal Constitution. Therefore in this law (which is to be found on pages 305, 306, 307, and 308 of the last compilation of the Constitution, Rules, and Manual provided by the Senate) there will be found no attempt to transcend the grant of power of the Constitution as to the reception and count of the electoral votes. It provided the method of certification of the results; and it will be observed that not only was the manner of the election of the electoral college confided to each State and to the discretion of the Legislature of each State, but that the certification, the authentication of the electoral vote, was confided wholly and unreservedly by the Constitution to the States. And nowhere is power given to either House of Congress to pass upon the election, either the manner or the fact, of electors for President and Vice-President; and if the Congress of the United States, either one or both Houses, shall assume, under the guise or pretext of telling or counting a vote, to decide the fact of the election of electors who are to form the college by whom the President and Vice-President are to be chosen, then they will have taken upon themselves an authority for which I, for one, can find no warrant in this charter of limited powers. This was the belief, and the action of the country has been in accordance with this belief from its foundation until February 6, 1865; and then, for the first time, did the Congress of the United States assume the authority by the vote of either House to put a veto upon the count of a State's vote. That such a rule was without constitutional warrant, I cannot doubt; and I do not think I am going too far when I say that the unconstitutionality of that rule is generally admitted.

I find in the record of the debates of Congress in February, 1865, nothing to instruct me or any other student of this country's history as to the reasons upon which Congress undertook to frame the twenty-second joint rule. There were no debates that I can discover on the subject. I presume the matter was perhaps, as now, arranged by party caucus and silently passed, and reason was neither given nor sought in a Congress composed almost entirely of one political party. Nor do I mean to say that the rule in 1865 was founded solely upon party considerations. On the contrary, there was an opposition so feeble as scarcely to be called one at that time, and from that time to this the rule has been deemed good enough to be let alone. For ten years the rule has continued, and two presidential elections have proceeded under it, indeed three, for the votes of the election for Mr. Lincoln's second term and of the present President's two terms were counted under it. Now for some reason it is sought to be changed. The mind of the honorable Senator who has had this matter in charge has undergone some fluctuations on this subject. At first he introduced a resolution for the absolute repeal of the twenty-second joint rule. After the lapse of a week he came into the Senate, and, calling up the subject, moved to amend his own proposition by simply changing that part of the rule which gave to either House the right to reject the electoral votes of a State into a requirement that both Houses must join in the rejection or the vote should be counted. Then we were dealing with the rules of the two Houses. Upon still further reflection the Senator, by authority of his committee, has brought forward a new proposition in the form of a bill which is to accomplish its object by the act of the two Houses of Congress receiving the President's assent, and can then only be repealed by their joint action.

Now, sir, it seems to me that the proper method of dealing with this subject should be by a joint rule and not by a statute. If any action be necessary, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] reminds me, certainly of the two modes a joint rule of both Houses is preferable. It has been the one heretofore pursued, and I know of no reason why the form of a statute should now be preferred to what heretofore has been relied upon.

And here, Mr. President, I cannot avoid saying that this subject ought to be entirely separate from the taint of party politics. The passions of party can but obscure and render it dangerous. No man, no party, can be safe in legislating upon the basis of party passion. I do not say that this measure is of that character, but I will say that I am surprised that it should be regarded as essential to be passed at the present session when, as we all know, an opportunity is about to be afforded within one week from the present time of having this important subject passed upon by two Houses of Congress differing in their political sentiments, and therefore more fit to agree upon a measure which shall be of party advantage to neither.

Sir, this subject should be raised high above and beyond party; and if it be not, then evil will come from it, and perhaps it may return to plague the inventors and not those for whose defeat it was designed. The subject is one of great difficulty. Contingencies have arisen, may again arise, nay their presence is contemplated by this very bill and provision is sought to be made for them, for which the Constitution of the United States has provided no apparent remedy. I can well imagine that in a government depending so entirely upon the active co-operation of all its parts, a government so thoroughly one of consent, and which relied for its real strength and true power upon the voluntary action of its citizens, and to which coercion in all forms was so necessarily fatal, its founders could not have imagined that in the high council of an electoral college and the counting of their votes for the Chief Magistracy of the country the common passions that attend contested elections for minor offices would have had weight or force. I do not know that they based their action in the articles of the Constitution which relate to this subject, upon such an idea; but it is certain they made no provision for facts which we have seen arising unfortunately in our own day, and which this bill contemplates in the future and seeks to provide for. The clause of the Constitution under which the count of the electoral vote is to be made is in the twelfth article of the amendments. It prescribes that—

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each—

This is the power of the electors in the respective States where they are to make their lists of the number of votes for each—

> which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

There is nothing in this language that authorizes either House of Congress, or both Houses of Congress, to interfere with the decision which has been made by the electors themselves and certified by them and sent to the President of the Senate. There is no pretext that for any cause whatever Congress has any power, or all the other departments of the Government have any power, to refuse to receive and count the result of the action of the voters in the States in that election as certified by the electors whom they have chosen. That questions may arise whether that choice was made, that questions may arise whether that election was properly held or whether it was a free and fair election, is undoubtedly true; but there is no machinery provided for contest and no contest seems to have been anticipated on this subject. It is casus omissus, intentionally or otherwise, upon the part of those who framed this Government, and we must take it as it is, and if there be necessity for its amendment, for its supplement, that must be the action of the American people in accordance with the Constitution itself; and I am free to say that some amendment on this subject should be had. But because there is no machinery provided, no tribunal appointed by which this most important issue and contest may be decided as to who was chosen an elector for President and Vice-President in any State, that certainly does not justify Congress in assuming either by direct formal claim of the power in the enactment of a law, or by adopting rules which shall give them such power as will be equivalent to the control of the subject; that is to say, a power of veto, which, under the present twenty-second joint rule, is given to either House, or under the present bill is to be assumed by both Houses acting together. I have been able to find, and I believe there exists, no such power either for one House or for both.

But there was provided, in case of the failure from any cause to ascertain the persons elected from a canvass of the electoral votes as so certified and transmitted to the President of the Senate, a provision that "immediately"—to use the language of the Constitution—"the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President." When, therefore, you come to construe a constitution which in the same connection, in the same connected phrases, provided for the subject of counting the votes and election of a President, you are bound to construe it so that a power that is not given shall not be assumed, and if for any cause there be default in the election in one mode pointed out, then you are compelled to resort to the other mode, which is plainly here expressed as supplementary in case of failure of the first.

I will illustrate that by a reference to the second section of this bill, and I am sorry the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is not present, because he has intimated to us his approval of this section, which I cannot assent to, which provides that if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State "purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return."

And this section you read in connection with section 1, which provides that unless the two Houses shall concur in an affirmative vote of rejection, all the electoral votes shall be counted. Now, sir, what is the result of this? Let us suppose that one hundred and fifty electoral votes come from certain States alleged to be regular, but more than one return is received from this same region of country, and one hundred and fifty more electoral votes come up in the same form, the same to the outward eye, certified in the same manner, covered by the same character of envelope and seal, and they are presented. Under this section and the first section all of these votes must be received and counted unless the two Houses shall join in an affirmative vote to reject them. What is the result of that? Say, for illustration, that an electoral college consists of three hundred votes; one hundred and fifty votes additional are presented in the manner I have described. They must be accepted under this bill unless the united affirmative vote of the two Houses rejects them. Supposing that affirmative vote to be lacking in one House, they must be counted, and you have then an electoral college of four hundred and fifty votes instead of three hundred. What does the Constitution say? The man who has received a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, that is to say, the man who has received one hundred and fifty votes out of the three hundred recognized by our present count of electoral votes as the extent of the electoral college, would be entitled to the office; but you have increased that three hundred to four hundred and fifty by admitting one hundred and fifty other double returns from other districts of country, and then two hundred and twenty-six votes will be required instead of one hundred and fifty-one, so that the provision of the Constitution which entitled the man who has received but a bare majority of the whole number of electors appointed is defeated by this section, that swells the electoral college to a vote that compels him to receive two hundred and twenty-six instead of one hundred and fifty-one.

Mr. President, there may be a flaw in this reasoning; it may be upon examination not only open to criticism but it may be entirely destroyed; but from the examination which the pressing duties in this body have thrown upon me of late have permitted me to give this subject, it does seem to me that by this bill you have virtually required a superior number of votes to elect a man which the Constitution did not contemplate, but which allowed a certain majority to authorize him to take his seat. Perhaps, as I say, upon examination my proposition may not be found to hold water, and yet at the same time I submit this subject so important to the criticism of other gentlemen in this body. If the demonstration can be made differently from what I propose to make it, I presume we shall hear it, because I cannot suppose that any member of the body would vote for a measure that does so materially change the rights of a candidate under the Constitution of the United States to take his seat as Chief Magistrate of the country when the provisions of that instrument have been complied with. If the effect of this bill is to require a larger number of votes for his majority than he would have if the electoral college was lawfully filled and only truly filled, then it seems to me this bill would be the most flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States.

But, Mr. President, let us look again at the effect of it. We had from the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] the other day a very thoughtful disquisition on this subject. Questions were then asked in the Senate and were not answered as to what should be done where a double vote was returned from a State and where two sets of electors each present their suffrages for different candidates from the same State at the same election. No one gave the answer, because the Constitution had provided no means whereby such a contest could be decided. It will be seen that this bill in its second section proposes to meet this very dangerous and difficult question of a contest between two sets of electoral votes from the same State at the same presidential election. It declares that all of these returns, the false as well as the true, shall be opened, and I can construe the language of the bill in no other way than that they shall be counted unless there is a concurrent affirmative vote of both Houses rejecting them. See then the result. There is here, if not the invitation, the opportunity given to raise a false claim in order to defeat a true election—and in determining such a claim the false and the true shall stand upon the same level and be only defeated by the same means, and if you shall between two Houses of Congress sufficiently inflame the passions of party the two Houses of Congress differing in party affiliations—if you shall sufficiently inflame them to warp the judgments of men or to warp the conscience of men and to set party above country and duty, then the false vote will weigh equally with the true vote, and the State will be disfranchised in the result as plainly as though you gave the veto power to either House as now. If you count ten votes for the State ticket and ten votes against the State ticket, what is the result? The one has neutralized the other; the one has annihilated the other; and the vote of the State might as well never have been cast at all. The election would then be an empty form. It is a new and a patent method for the disfranchisement of States where a contested election can be gotten up. That is the result of this second section as I read it. I shall be glad to be instructed to the contrary. I have read the section many times; I have submitted it to the judgment of others whose opinions I value more highly than my own, and have found a concurrence in the belief that this section is an opportunity, if not an invitation, for the annihilation of the electoral votes of States by having the false vote made equal in weight with the true and forbidding the rejection of either except by the concurrent affirmative vote of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, I will not anticipate evil results. I only say that we should give, so far as we can give, no opportunity for evil results; that we should not give our consent to a law that would, if carried out, wrongfully make a presidential election a nullity.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Delaware that I understand that this second section leaves the rule as it now is. I understand that by this second section if there are two sets of votes sent up from any State, then the concurrence of both Houses as to which shall be counted is required, and that is the rule at the present time.

Mr. BAYARD. If that be so, then an amendment which I have had draughted will not be objected to, to insert at the end of the second section:

And in such case the validity of any return shall be agreed to by both Houses, or the same shall not be counted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I had prepared an amendment, which I was going to submit to the Senator from Indiana, to the same effect.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] remarks to me sotto voce that that is what the bill means now. I know that I had not the benefit of his audience when this question was being discussed, and I do not propose to repeat what I have said on the subject; but I cannot conceive that the bill now means that. On the contrary, I believe the bill as it stands now, and if it passes as it stands now, will work the result that I have stated, and I am not alone in this view. Wherever a contest can be gotten up, and wherever public opinion is sufficiently excited, wherever the tone of political morality is low enough, there the contest will be raised and then the votes coming here certified in form must be counted under this section, as I conceive, unless the affirmative vote of both Houses shall reject them.

Mr. President, I do not think this second section meets the difficulty. It does not fill the want which we all recognize exists in the Constitution on this important subject. The Houses shall assemble; the Vice-President shall open the certificates and a count shall follow; it is not so important by whom that count shall be made, because being made in the presence of the Houses they are witnesses to a count, which means a valid, a real, a fair, an honest count; and when the time shall come that a dishonest count of such votes can be made in the presence of the two Houses, then your government will be of so little value that the sooner it passes away and makes place for another more honest, more reliable, the better for the people of the country.

But there may well be causes why you should doubt that the ticket which is represented by these electoral votes was not fairly entitled to be so represented as the sentiment of the people of the State from which it comes, and there should be, as there is not now, some tribunal in whom a deposit of power to determine such contests should be lodged. How shall that be reached? Only by an amendment to the Constitution, and certainly by an amendment in which all men without respect to party results must join. As I have said before, in dealing with the subject within the powers confided to us by the Constitution, there never was a better opportunity to place it upon a high non-partisan basis than by awaiting the incoming of a new Congress, in which the two Houses shall not be of the same political opinion. A rule framed between a democratic House of Representatives and a republican Senate must of necessity be a non-partisan rule; and why, when so golden and valuable an opportunity awaits close at hand for the purpose of accomplishing an amendment so important and beneficial, should it not be embraced, and why should the regular ordinary business of this body be postponed now to accomplish in hot haste that which should be accomplished only by great care and consideration? Why, Mr. President, it is well known that measures which challenge our closest care and criticism, measures which demand from us laborious and assiduous attention for the next six days, fill the Calendar. The interests of the public without respect to individuals, the interests of individuals to whom our duties are plain and clear as public representatives, ought to require from us all of the attention, all of the care, all of the labor that our frames can stand between now and the termination of the present session of Congress. Why is it then that measures like this, which need calm counsel, which need the abstraction of all partisan feeling from the mind of him who would properly comprehend and address himself to them—why is it that they are pressed? I will admit that their importance cannot well be exaggerated; but for that very reason is the argument strengthened that there should be time for deliberation and that the very circumstance should be allowed to take place which I say is so favorable to their proper decision.

Mr. President, if the matter were left to me, as I am glad that it is not, for I would shun the responsibility and I have great doubt of my capacity to deal with it properly—if it were left to me to decide how this question of contest shall be settled and where will you deposit the power that is to settle it, I would not be able to give an answer; but I am perfectly clear that the second section of this bill is no answer to such a demand. It provides no such remedy as solves this question. It satisfies no mind asking for decision in a case like this. As I said before, the measure is new; it just saw light in this body less than three weeks ago; and as I said to the Senate it was a remedy differing in method and substance from that which the same committee had reported as advisable in the month of January. If they change in so few days, if their opinion so vacillate, is it not of itself a reason why we should pause until opinion shall settle and crystallize itself by common agreement upon a proper and final method of dealing with this great and important subject? If gentlemen desire this subject to be considered by the light of partisan feeling, I will admit the present time is propitious. If they desire it settled upon what must necessarily be non-partisan feeling, and the settlement is important to everybody in the country, before the evils shall crush upon us owing to this defect in our law, it will be an evil common to all; no one may hope to escape it more than any other; no party or no individual can assume exemption from suffering in such a case—it is of the last importance that we should settle this properly.

There is ample time for the settlement. No use for such a law can arise for two years to come. It cannot be until the winter of 1876–'77, two years from the time at which I now speak, when the machinery which we seek to provide can be called into requisition. Why not then let this subject rest, so far as it has been mooted, aided by the reflections that have been suggested and expressed in regard to it; why not let the subject rest until you can have assured that which is assured, a non-partisan decision in regard to a subject that should be for the safety of this whole nation, lifted high above the atmosphere and the heat of party. If Senators desire that, they have an opportunity to secure it. If they desire, on the other hand, the decision made in haste, made upon the very heels of and in the midst of doubts expressed by the committee themselves who have reported this measure, then they will vote to press it to a present vote and decision, but it shall not be with my consent.

I know not, Mr. President, whether the reasons for pressing this measure at this time were avowed by the Senator in charge of it. I do not know whether I ought to ask whether, if the incoming House of Representatives were in accord with the opinions of the republican party and not the democratic party, the precious hours of this closing session would be insisted upon being occupied with the consideration of this subject; and yet I believe that we should be relieved from it if such were the case. Sir, not in this measure only, but in others do I certainly mourn that distrust which is thus expressed in the party to which I am attached. I mourn this distrust, not for the sake of the party against whom it is assumed, but I mourn it for the sake of the country. The late elections disclose the fact that there are more than one-half of the citizens of this country who do not approve of the policy of the republican party.

Mr. President, why this haste to take away from them their chance to express their opinion, to come into consultation upon subjects so permanent in their effects and in their nature as that which we are now discussing? Does this distrust felt in this country not, on the contrary, seem to intimate that in the opinion of one-half of the nation another half of the whole country contains a body of dissatisfied and untrustworthy citizens? I would beg the gentlemen who may feel such distrust not to express it. I ask that as much for their sakes as for our own. I beg them not to make so fatal an admission, so insulting and unkind to us and so dangerous to all. I would not have it believed abroad; I would not have it believed at home. I would bear much to prevent such ideas being prevalent. I do beseech Senators not to give credence to them by their votes and by their acts. It cannot be that this country contains any large body of citizens so lost to patriotism, so lost to the instincts of self-respect and of self-preservation, as to design anything which shall not inure to the credit and the happiness and the grandeur of our nation as a whole; and yet I can read in the haste with which this bill has been prepared, in the haste with which it is pressed, excluding other matters which are essential in justice and in duty for us to attend to—I cannot but read in that expression the fact that the latest expression of the country's sentiment is something inconsistent with the best interests and the safety of the country.

Mr. President, such an admission ought not to be made even if fear or party suspicions should prompt it. As I said before, it is fatal to our common interest. It is unjust to those against whom it is directed. It is utterly inimical to the safety and the prosperity of the country.

Therefore it is in this grave way I close the hasty remarks I have made upon this measure. I believe there is no warrant for the power which is sought to be assumed by Congress over this matter. I believe the bill as it now stands will have the effect of changing that majority which the Constitution entitles a man who has received it to elect him to the Presidency, and of increasing it so that but for the provisions of this bill he might be the duly elected President of the United States, but under the provisions of this bill he will not be because more votes are required by the bill than the Constitution requires him to have received in order to be declared elected.

Federal Intervention in the States.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN J. DAVIS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, a crisis has been reached in our history which demands our most serious and deliberate consideration. Its importance cannot be exaggerated; its dangers cannot be overlooked, nor the responsibilities it imposes be avoided or put aside. No words can portray too vividly or forcibly the perils which surround us. Absolutism reaches forth its parricidal hands to grasp the throat of the Government; an authority created by the States, with limited and defined powers in order to protect them, turns upon them to destroy them by the sword; arbitrary power has raised its arm to strike down the Constitution; and should we falter in our duty now and permit it to be overthrown, posterity will reproach us with pusillanimity and hold our names in everlasting contempt.

I had hoped, sir, that the intermeddling with and the setting up and pulling down of State governments whenever anything in their administration was displeasing to a majority in Congress or to the authorities of the Federal Government was at an end; that Federal power would in the future confine its operations to the limits assigned to it by the Constitution; and that the States would be allowed to care for their own internal concerns without the impertinent and unconstitutional interference to which they have been subjected in the past. "'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished," but one it seems we are not to expect, as long as we tolerate the unbridled audacity and assumptions of executive authority. Louisiana prostrate beneath the heel of military power, and the threatened assault upon Arkansas contained in the executive message addressed to the Senate (February 8th) reveal the determined purpose of arbitrary power not to cease the murder of States. This remarkable paper, the signal-gun of the empire, taken in connection with the manifestations of executive power in the employment of Federal soldiery to disperse the Legislature of a sovereign State, recalls the history of more than two centuries ago, and is an assumption of despotic powers which should arouse in the minds of the people of the United States a fearful sense of their danger from unrestrained usurpation. Stripped of all disguises, what is it but a renewal of the conflict fought by our British ancestors—of prerogative against liberty? We must determine now whether we shall be citizens of a free Government or the subjects and slaves of a military despotism—whether the Government established by the Constitution, with all its limitations and restrictions upon power, shall be maintained, or whether, unmindful of the great struggles and triumphs of our forefathers in the cause of liberty and mankind, we will remain indifferent to the objects for which it was instituted, and permit it to be overthrown by executive or legislative usurpation?

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the spirit of liberty, like the words of the holy man, still survives the prophet, and that, mindful of the traditions of the past and inspired by the hopes of the future, we shall not fail in the performance of our duty to meet boldly and rebuke sternly these and similar encroachments upon the rights of the States. They strike at the great bulwark of our liberties, annihilate our constitutional rights, and change and subvert the entire form and structure of the Government. The last vestige of State sovereignty, the very existence of the States as separate and distinct political communities, and the right of local self-government are bound up in the issue and are at stake.

Should the throttling of Louisiana by military power be approved or the recommendations of executive authority in regard to Arkansas be obeyed, and this body by its legislation, framed upon the dangerous precedents and usurpations which stand as blots upon the escutcheon of the Republic, still further encroach upon the rights of the States, the day is not distant when anarchy will banish law, the reign of disorder, violence, and oppression will be inaugurated, and our boasted freedom will be a memory to mock us for our faithlessness to the cause of liberty.

It is idle to think, sir, that the liberties of Louisiana alone are menaced; those of the people of each and all the States are threatened by the blow inflicted upon her. Her cause is the cause of all; and the gravity of the issue, so far reaching in its consequences, renders the present a fit occasion for the reiteration of those fundamental truths and doctrines which lie at the foundation of the Government, that seem to have been forgotten of late years, and a departure from which has encouraged the aggressions of arbitrary power and invited the approach of military despotism.

It is time to pause in our career and inquire whether, corrupted by wealth or dazzled by the trappings and tinsel of official station, we have become indifferent to the teachings of history and ceased so remember that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Each day records the birth of some new innovation upon the Constitution or encroachment upon our rights, and testifies to our blind confidence in authority and our submission to usurpations. So frequent have they become, we are no longer shocked by the arrogance of power and its disregard of law. Unchecked, it is gradually but steadily sapping the foundation of government, and under the assaults of constructionists and innovators the superstructure reels and totters. The observance of the Constitution is the exception, its violation the rule by public functionaries, who make each aggression the pretext and authority for another, until, swollen by assumptions unrebuked, and strengthened by whatever of power has been wrested by usurpation, these agents and servants of the people bestride their necks like some huge colossus, and by the discipline of the sword and bayonet compel them to submit to political ravishment. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, if the breath of liberty still survives, those in authority must be taught that States cannot be ruthlessly overthrown and the rights of the people trampled in the dust by military power; that executive power shall be restrained by law, and when it oversteps the limits assigned to it that resistance in every legitimate form to its usurpations is essential to the preservation of liberty, and become the most sacred of duties on the part of the citizen. I submit, it is high time we should abandon that "confidence in authority," and especially executive authority, which is "the parent of despotism." Every new encroachment calls for a new assertion of popular rights; every assault upon the Federal system demands a reassertion of the principles underlying the Constitution, lest it should be overwhelmed by bad precedents, the Government subverted, the people's rights buried in oblivion, and they themselves forget their former freedom.

It is the inherent nature of power always to encroach unless restrained, and in a government such as ours, which derives its powers by delegation, we should ever be jealous and watchful to restrain it within the boundaries assigned to it by the compact under which it was established.

Now, sir, in view of what has transpired recently and of what is threatened it may not be unprofitable to inquire briefly what are the powers of the Federal Government and what relation does it sustain toward the States. No one can deny the fact that within the last few years the Government has been rapidly tending toward consolidation and centralism; that the Constitution is becoming a dead letter; that all the restrictions and limitations imposed by it upon the powers of government have been disregarded; and that the rights of the States have been ignored and are being swept away. It is only, therefore, by a "frequent recurrence to first principles" that the Government can be maintained and liberty preserved.

To assert that the Federal Government is a sovereignty possessed of inherent power is to state what is false in fact and dangerous in principle. In the language of Chief Justice Marshal, "the supreme, absolute, and uncontrollable power is in the people of the States before they make a constitution, and remains in them after it is made. Absolute sovereignty never goes from the people."

In their colonial days and while under the control of the British Crown, the colonies were subjected to the sovereignty of government, as the king was the source and fountain of sovereignty. Their relation to the Crown was one of subordination, and the supremacy of Parliament over them was omnipotent. It was absolute sovereignty in the one and absolute subordination in the other. There was no recognition of the principle that sovereignty and the right of self-government reside in the people; and but for the Revolution, this doctrine, with the consequent rights of dividing and limiting power, would perhaps have slept forever in theory. The framers of the Constitution wisely discarded the idea of absolute sovereignty in governments, and guided by the sound political doctrines of limitation, restriction, and division of power, gave force to the principle of self-government, and vitality to the fundamental truth that "sovereignty resides in the people and that magistrates are their trustees and servants." The distinction between the two principles is a material and a vital one, and should be borne in mind in considering the powers of government, either State or Federal. Under the one principle the people as the sovereign delegate or bestow powers; under the other they receive limited rights or privileges. The king bestows upon his subjects rights and franchises; the people under our theory of government delegate powers and reserve to themselves all not delegated.

While discarding the principle of sovereignty in governments and holding to the doctrine that sovereignty or the right of self-government—the constitution, government-making power resides in the people, we must be careful to ignore also the assumption that the Federal Government was framed upon the basis that it resides in the people of the United States as one people. Such an assumption is barren of historical evidences to support it, and is as dangerous in principle as the doctrine of sovereignty in governments. If it could be sustained, the logic of it would be that the people of the several States never possessed the right of self-government as sovereign States; that their governments were derived from or established by permission of the people of the United States as one people in whom sovereignty alone resides, and that they are held at their will and pleasure, or at the will and pleasure of a majority of them; and such, indeed, seems to be the opinion of the modern reconstructionist, whose political philosophy is drawn from other sources than the Constitution, and is restricted to a single dogma—party expediency.

During their colonial dependence upon the British government the relation of the colonies toward each other was that of distinct communities, with separate governments established under royal charters, the sovereignty of each being vested in the Crown. When by the Revolution the tie was severed and they renounced their allegiance and became independent States, the sovereignty theretofore vested in the Crown was vested in the people of each State respectively as a separate and distinct political body, and not in the people of the United States as one people or as a consolidated nation. Possessed of all the attributes and rights of sovereignty, the States framed and established governments for themselves, each State acting separately and independently of the others, and through the instrumentality and direct action of their separate governments established the old Confederation and first Articles of Union. In the creation of this Confederation the sovereignty of the States was recognized, but not more distinctly than in the establishment of the Constitution of the United States and the Government under it. States were parties to the old Confederation; they are likewise parties to the Constitution. The Government resulting from the latter rests upon the authority of the people of each State; the government under the former upon the authority of the governments of the several States, by which the States admitted themselves to have been bound only as they possessed the power to make treaties. And as the State governments had the right to destroy such treaties, in order to form a more perfect union and to place the compact on better ground, the authority of the people of each State was substituted for the governments of the several States in establishing the Constitution. It is the creature of sovereignty, and the Federal Government is its result. It did not emanate from the people of the United States as one people, nor is the Government established by it the Government of a majority. Its foundation is laid on the basis that sovereignty, or the powers of government resides in the people, but in the people of each State only as a separate, distinct, and independent community. To the people as thus organized by social compact and called States, possessing the right of self-government and sovereignty, its origin is to be traced.

Resulting from the Constitution as a compact established between the States as parties, to which each State acting for itself as a separate community and sovereign body assented, the Federal Government is the government of States for the management of the general concerns of the States united, and not for the management of local or individual concerns; and in its relation toward the governments of the several States stands as "a co-ordinate department of one single integral whole." The principle of supremacy and subordination, of superior and inferior as between the Federal and State governments is unknown to our system, and if recognized would unsettle the division of powers between them and invest the Federal Government with a power to destroy the States. There is a supremacy admitted—the supremacy of law. The Constitution asserts its own supremacy as law for the government of the several political departments created by it, and over the persons and things to which the powers therein delegated extend. To the extent of the powers delegated, and to that extent only, it is the government of the States; beyond the limits of the delegated powers it is the government of none. When the Federal Government, therefore, transcends the boundaries of delegated powers it ceases to be the Government established by the Constitution, and its acts are usurpations. I have hurriedly and very imperfectly, without attempting to elaborate, stated a few of the fundamental doctrines touching the relation between the Federal Government and the States which seem to me to be worthy of especial consideration at the present time. In support of the theory, however, that the Federal Government is the government of the States, resulting from the Constitution as a compact established between States as sovereign bodies, the proofs are numerous and indisputable. The Constitution itself furnishes the plainest evidence in its origin, establishment, and terms. The members of the convention which framed it were appointed by States, voted by States without regard to the number of people, and it was adopted by thirteen votes. It was ratified and assented to by States, acting separately, through conventions of delegates chosen by the people of each State. Its legislative powers are delegated to a Congress, one branch of which is to be chosen by the people of the several States, the choice being confined to electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, thus recognizing a fundamental right belonging to the States, which of late years has been invaded and usurped by the Federal Government, namely, the right of each State to determine the qualifications of its own electors; while the other branch of the Congress is to be elected by the Legislatures of the several States, and in which the equality of the States is preserved in order, as Dr. Franklin said in the convention, "the better to guard the rights of the States in all cases, or questions wherein the sovereignties of the individual States might be affected" or "their authority over their own citizens might be diminished."

The President also is elected by and is the Chief Magistrate of States; and in case of no election by electors, he is to be chosen by the House of Representatives, "the votes to be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote;" and not to dwell longer on the internal evidences afforded by the Constitution itself, it provides finally that "the ratifications of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the States so ratifying the same." The framers of the Constitution regarded it as a compact between the States as sovereign bodies, to which States, and not individuals, were the parties. A few brief references will suffice on this point. In the eighty-fifth number of the Federalist, Alexander Hamilton says: "The compacts are to embrace thirteen distinct States in a common bond of amity and union." And again, speaking of the Constitution, he says: "It must inevitably consist of a great variety of particulars in which thirteen independent States are to be accommodated in their interests or opinions of interest," and "hence the necessity of molding and arranging all the particulars which are to compose the whole in such manner as to satisfy all the parties to the compact."

Mr. Madison, in No. 39 of the Federalist, says that—

> The Constitution is to be founded on the assent and ratification of the people of America, given by deputies elected for the special purpose. * * * But this assent is to be given by the people not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong. It is to be the assent and ratification of the several States, derived from the supreme authority in each State, the authority of the people themselves. The act, therefore, in establishing the Constitution will not be a national, but a federal act.

And again, in the same number, he says:

> It must result from the unanimous assent of the several States that are parties to it; and each State in ratifying the Constitution is considered as a sovereign body, independent of all others, and only to be bound by its own voluntary act.

Again, in No. 40, he says:

> Do they require that in the establishment of the Constitution the States should be regarded as distinct and independent sovereigns? They are so regarded by the Constitution proposed.

And Chief Justice Marshall said:

The General Government is a federal body of our own creation.

With this limited inquiry into the sources from which the Constitution emanated, which suggested itself as not an inappropriate one to this occasion in view of the repeated assertions that State rights is a dead dogma of the past, I shall discuss briefly the still more important question, What are the powers of the Federal Government?

It is the habit of a certain school of statesman, whose conceptions of the powers of the Government are bounded by party necessity alone, to treat with derision and contempt any reference to the Constitution as the guide or test by which the powers of the Federal Government shall be ascertained. If the existence of the Constitution is ever admitted by this school, they so interpret its provisions as to destroy its limitations and restrictions, and by the assumption of undelegated powers place in jeopardy the liberties of the people. But as the Constitution is a definition of, and a limitation upon the powers delegated by the people, and is their only defense against the ambition of rulers as well as against the violence of the mob, it becomes our highest duty to maintain its authority, and to insist that, by its provisions strictly and fairly construed, the powers of the Federal Government shall be determined. Its limitations frittered away by construction, or broken down by usurpation, the Government becomes an engine of despotism in the hands of an unrestrained majority. The objects and concerns over which its powers were not to extend will be drawn into its rapacious jaws as power increases, and the governments of the States, to which the people should ever be taught to look as affording the surest protection to their lives, their liberties, and their properties, and as being the safest bulwarks against anti-republican government, will exist, if at all, only as feeble corporations, stripped of power and dignity, and as miserable caricatures of free commonwealths. And to this complexion they have come if the usurpations of Federal authority are longer tolerated. I have faith enough, however, in the integrity of the people and in their love of liberty to believe, that when their attention is once more directed to the character, nature, and extent of the powers of the Federal Government, and to the dangerous advances usurpation has made on their rights by the assumption of powers never bestowed, they will rally under the Constitution, and, pointing to its restrictions and specifications, say to Federal authority, "Thus far shalt thou come but no farther."

And first let them remember that the Government of the United States is a government resulting from the Constitution which was made by States, to establish a government for States with reference to objects principally external to them; that it possesses no inherent primitive powers or sovereignty, and is not a government of the majority, in which numbers according to population control its operations. Its powers are wholly conventional and derivative, and are enumerated, limited, and defined by the Constitution. They were bestowed by delegation by the several States, which, in confirmation of their sovereign authority, reserved every right they had not delegated, whether particularly enumerated or tacitly retained. It is correct, therefore, to say that the powers of the Federal Government are delegated powers, and whenever a question of power is raised, an appeal to the Constitution as a guide must be resorted to to determine whether it may be exercised or not. Such powers as are therein delegated, and only such, belong to the Federal Government; all not delegated nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. The reservation and the delegations were both made by the same power—by the people of the several States as distinct political bodies.

The powers reserved by the States, which are numerous and undefined, are withdrawn from and are not subject to the influence of the Constitution, or to the control of either of the political departments created by it in any manner whatever. The States hold them as independent nations, just as they held the delegated powers before the formation of the Union and the establishment of the Constitution, and may exercise them as to them shall seem best in order to promote the happiness, protect the lives and properties, and secure the liberties of their citizens. And any invasion of, or transgression upon the domain of reserved powers by the Federal Government, or any department thereof, is a flagrant violation of the Constitution, revolutionary in its character, subversive of the objects for which the Government was instituted, and dangerous to the existence of the States. To protect the latter in the exercise of all their undelegated powers and to secure to the people the right of local self-government—the right to establish, alter, or abolish their governments and institute new ones, "organizing their powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," was the object of jealous care and great concern on the part of the framers of the Constitution as well as of the fathers of the Revolution.

One of the principal causes which led the Colonies to resist the Crown and throw off their allegiance was the right assumed and claimed by Parliament to legislate for and control their internal and domestic affairs. As I have before stated, neither Crown nor Parliament recognized their right to local self-government, and if any principle was established by the Revolution and supposed to be firmly secured to the people it is the right of self-government in each State, or the right of the people to govern themselves. It was for this our fathers fought, and they were careful to guard it in the formation of the Federal Government. The boundaries of the States were respected and the right of internal self-government reserved and secured to them by the Constitution. So sacred and dear was this right held by the wise men who framed the instrument and so jealous were the States of their powers, that in establishing the Government they delegated but few powers, and provided for the limitation and division of such as were delegated among the different departments created by the Constitution. As descriptive of the powers of the Federal Government I quote the following by Mr. Madison:

The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State.—Federalist, No. 45.

And in the same number of the Federalist he says:

The State governments may be regarded as essential parts of the Federal Government, while the latter is nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former.

The Constitution defines the character of the Government and the nature of its powers. States are its constituents, and its powers are delegated, few and defined. In vain do we search among the delegated powers for one that authorizes the Federal Government or any department thereof to interfere with the internal or domestic affairs of the States. The regulation and the protection of these, with all that appertains to the establishment of governments to defend the internal peace and security of the States, belong to the States. Within the limits of reserved powers the States are not only beyond the influence of the Constitution or any of the political departments created by it, but, for the very purpose of controlling the operations of the Federal Government for their own security, the Constitution has invested the States with a power over it, and subjects its workings to their influence in many important particulars, only a few of which I shall instance; as, for example, in the election of a President and Senators, in the power to compel Congress to call a convention, in their right to affirm or reject amendments, and to ratify changes in the Federal Government without its consent. To the extent of the powers delegated the several political departments of the Government are the representatives of the States; and the framers of the Constitution, lest this representation should usurp powers over private persons and internal concerns, carefully defined such common interests of the States as were intended to be intrusted to their representative. They relate chiefly to war, peace, taxation, commerce, and our intercourse with foreign nations; and when the Federal Government or either of its departments assumes a power over the State governments, it usurps the authority of the people themselves, never transferred, especially reserved, and necessary for the preservation of their liberty.

In the light of the principles I have so imperfectly and feebly presented, may I not ask, by virtue of what law or what authority the powers of the Federal Government are employed to strike down the governments of States? In what article of the Constitution does the President of the United States find the power authorizing him to disperse, or purge the Legislature of a State with Federal soldiers and drive from its halls members claiming to have been duly elected, of whose qualifications, election, and returns the Legislature was the sole judge? If he has power to authorize, or depute his major-generals and subordinates in the Federal Army to exercise the functions which properly belong to the Legislatures of the States, has he not the same power and authority of law to deprive the people of the right to elect at all, and to appoint Legislatures for them in such manner and composed of such persons as he in his pleasure may choose? Were not the proceedings in Louisiana on the 4th of January tantamount to the assumption of such power on the part of Federal authority? They struck a deadly blow at the right of self-government, and menaced with destruction the securities of election and representation, which are the defenses provided under our system of government to protect the liberties of the people against the corruptions and tyranny of rulers. The maintenance of these rights in all their vigor and unimpaired, is necessary to prevent the powers delegated by the people from degenerating in the hands of those who exercise them into an absolutism.

History is full of examples warning us that governments which have aimed at becoming absolute have always endeavored to destroy the principle of election and representation, and that "executive power sometimes forgets its origin and its limits; that it was bestowed to protect and maintain rights, to respect liberty; and when it meets with but a feeble assertion of liberties it is soon transformed into despotism." But still more alarming, if possible, than the interference of Federal power in Louisiana is the threatened overthrow of the government of Arkansas, and the bold assumption of executive authority that the States of the South may frame only such constitutions and enact such laws as a majority in Congress, or the President, shall dictate and approve. While his threat is leveled at the South, the precedent once established and his doctrine admitted, the fate of other States is easily foretold. Their existence will depend upon the breath of executive or legislative power.

Has it indeed come to this, that the right of the people of the States to amend, alter, or abolish their constitutions and establish new ones, organizing the powers of government "in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," is a right held in subordination to the will of a President or a majority of Congress, and to be exercised only as they shall permit? Are we ready to concede that when the political complexion of a State Legislature is distasteful to a partisan President or a like majority in Congress, or that when the administration of a State government is not in accord with their views and wishes, they shall strike it down and set up another in its stead fashioned after their own fancy and better suited to their purposes? Did our fathers resist the supremacy of King and Parliament only to perpetuate and establish the supremacy of President and Congress? Shall these departments, the mere creatures of sovereignty, be permitted to absorb all the authority of the people and, in imitation of the convention and Napoleon in France, declare "the elect of the sovereign itself sovereign?" The governments of the States are not held by charters granted either by President or Congress, nor is there any power delegated by the Constitution to either of these departments to authorize their interference in the establishment of such governments, or in the local or internal concerns of the States.

The States are restricted by the Constitution in but one respect in regard to the establishment of governments—in their forms they shall continue to be republican. So long as the forms of government existing at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution shall be substantially preserved by the States, there is no power in the Federal Government or outside of it that has any right to molest them in the exercise of their inherent right to institute and establish their own governments in their own way. The assumption that what is termed the "guarantee" clause of the Constitution bestows a power on Congress to sit in judgment upon forms of government in States, and to fix a standard in accordance with their own opinions of what is or should be a republican government, to which the governments of the several States must conform on pain of being overturned by congressional legislation, is as dangerous to the stability of free governments and the liberties of the people of the States as any assumption of despotism. Such a power vested in Congress as between it and the States would be a lash in the hands of the former to scourge the States into submission and subserviency to its behests; and it is a reflection upon the wisdom and patriotism of the framers of the Constitution to suppose that after the jealousy manifested in regard to the rights of the States, and the great care taken to guard them against the encroachment of Federal power, they had invested Congress with power to overthrow their forms of government and blot them out.

Until the inauguration of the baneful and unconstitutional policy of reconstruction, Congress had never assumed the power to establish forms of government or dictate constitutions to the States. In all the past history of congressional legislation preceding that relating to the reconstruction of the South not an act is to be found sustaining the assumption, that to set up or pull down a State government, or to put in or out of office a State executive by authority either of Congress or the President are among the powers delegated to the Federal Government. Among the provisions in the Constitution in the nature of a stipulation between the States, rather than a delegation of power to either of the political departments of the Government, is to be found section 4 of the fourth article, known as the "guarantee" clause, which reads as follows:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

As interpreted by Mr. Madison, in No. 43 of the Federalist, the authority of the section quoted "extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long therefore as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed to them by the Federal Constitution."

In the case of Luther vs. Borden et al., 7 Howard, Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, in what seems to be rather an obiter dictum, for the point did not fairly arise upon the record in that case, that—

> Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

The "guarantee," as understood by Mr. Madison and Chief Justice Taney, was clearly intended to be of the governments then existing and such others as might be subsequently formed from time to time by the people of the States respectively, and that in case of conflict between an existing government of a State and an opposing force claiming to be the government within its jurisdiction Congress should determine which of the two is the established government of the State; but neither the authority of the court in the case referred to nor the opinion of Mr. Madison can be appealed to, to sustain the doctrine that to enforce the "guarantee" Congress or the President may overturn the established governments of States in order to bring them into harmony with the sentiments of any political faction or power. This provision of the Constitution and solemn covenant between the States, made for their security, is converted into a means for their destruction, and by an unwarranted perversion of its terms is construed as giving to Congress a supervising power to overthrow and establish governments under the pretense of enforcing the guarantee.

The States, when they ratified the Constitution, never contemplated interference in their internal concerns, except in cases of invasion and domestic violence, and in respect to the latter only upon application made by the Legislature, or when it cannot be convened by the executive of the State. The clause of the Constitution in question cannot be invoked to justify the extraordinary proceedings in Louisiana or the threatened overthrow of the government in Arkansas.

To digress for a moment, were the question of construction still an open one, I should venture to suggest, Mr. Speaker, with great diffidence, that by section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution the duty to guarantee a republican form of government to each State is one that is imposed on neither Congress nor the President, and that it is quite in accordance with the nature and theory of our Government to construe this clause so as to place the performance of the duty upon the States as individual members of the Union. It will be observed that the article does not, like other provisions of the Constitution where power is delegated, designate the political department that is to exercise it. The phraseology of the section is "the United States shall guarantee to each State, and protect each of them, and on application of the Legislature or executive, suppress domestic violence"—terms applicable to States, and not to the President or Congress. The duty to be performed is a guarantee by contracting parties who are stipulating for the preservation of their mutual liberties. And what is a guarantee? A contract or undertaking, a compact to be performed by the parties making it. As States made it, and as Congress was not then in existence and could be no party to the compact between the States, it could enter into no engagement to perform a guarantee for the safety of the States.

If the United States, in attempting to guard themselves against arbitrary power with the defense of a mutual guarantee, have delegated to Congress a power over the forms of their government, they have not only made a dangerous mistake, but one which makes any reservation of powers on their part worse than useless. Is not the guarantee a duty to be performed by States, and the protection stipulated for an assistance to be rendered by States to States upon such emergencies as would make dispatch and contiguity important? It is the duty of the Federal Government to provide for the defense of the whole Union, and for that purpose it is empowered to declare war, raise armies, and call forth the militia to suppress insurrections and repel invasions. The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, in enumerating the general powers delegated to Congress for defending the Union, declares that it shall have power "to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions." These powers are not subject to any special restriction, and insurrection and invasion are expressions equivalent or tantamount to "invasion" and "domestic violence," the terms employed in the guarantee clause. Does it not, therefore, seem a little absurd, after bestowing an unrestricted power on Congress in the provision of the Constitution just recited, that the same power should be conferred upon it by the fourth article of the same instrument, to be exercised only on application of the Legislature, or, when it cannot be convened, of the executive?

It is the duty of the Federal Government, as I have said, to provide for the common defense of the whole Union; but it would not have been the duty of particular States to defend an invaded State, or one in which domestic violence existed, except for this stipulation; and to prevent an impertinent intrusion of one State in the affairs of another a previous application for assistance is required. Between the States themselves such a power is harmless and useful, but between Congress and the States it may become, as I have said, a scourge and an instrument of torture. These thoughts are thrown out with a profound sense of the risk incurred in presuming to intimate a doubt as to the soundness or correctness of the construction which has obtained, and become settled law, in respect to the Department of the Government upon which the duty is imposed of enforcing the guarantee clause of the Constitution.

The power of the President to interfere in cases of insurrection or domestic violence is bestowed by the act of Congress passed February 28, 1795, to enforce the section in article 1 of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions," and by the act of March 3, 1807, supplementary thereto. The first section of the act of 1795 is as follows:

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the United States shall be invaded or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

It will be observed by this act that the President is not made the judge of when a state of insurrection exists in any State against the government thereof that requires Federal aid to suppress it, and that he dare not invade a State for that purpose until the Legislature or the executive thereof (when the Legislature cannot be convened) makes application for such assistance. The terms of this statute are too plain to be misunderstood or to require comment; and tested by its provisions the acts of Federal power in Louisiana on the 4th day of January last are without excuse or justification of law and flagrantly unconstitutional. No application such as is required by the act of Congress was made by the Legislature of that State, or by the governor thereof, and if made by the latter when the Legislature could be convened, would afford no ground for Federal intervention under the act referred to. In defiance of the Constitution, without authority of law, and by force of arms, that State has been shackled and bound and delivered over to the usurpers who are preying upon its body and plundering the people. I shall not recite what transpired in that unfortunate State on that memorable day. The country is familiar with all the facts, and public judgment has been pronounced upon them in condemnation of the outrage committed upon popular rights and representative government.

The pretext alleged for the commission of these and other acts of arbitrary power which are threatened, is that intimidation, terrorism, and violence prevail in the South, and that governments, to use the language of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] "where such things are possible" are "not republican in form." If by this rule the power of the Federal Government to intervene in the affairs of the States is to be determined, what State in the Union is secure against the exercise of a power which claims the right, where violence, disorder, and lawlessness, which are common to a certain extent in all the States, to overturn their governments by Federal bayonets, and establish others by the sword? If such power can be exercised at all, you cannot limit its operation to one section of the Union alone; and I put it to gentlemen upon this floor representing the great States of the North, and to the gentleman from Illinois, whether they are willing to tolerate the exercise of a power so dangerous in their own States.

Is a State, in which such things are possible, as are alleged in the following proclamation, without a republican form of government?

STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Springfield, February 5, 1875.

To the honorable the senate and house of representatives:

From recent and reliable information received by this department, it is evident that a spirit of lawlessness prevails in Williamson County, in this State. Murders have been committed from the brush and under cover of darkness, and the murderers go unpunished. Men armed and in disguise ride through the country at night, disturbing the peace, terrifying the citizens, and committing acts of violence disgraceful to the age and to our civilization. Persons and property are insecure. The people seem to be overawed, and terrorism and intimidation pervade alike the civil authorities and private citizens. There is no force nor fund at the disposal of the executive adequate to the emergency. I therefore, in full view of all the circumstances, respectfully urge upon the General Assembly the propriety of placing at the control of the executive a sum not less than $10,000, to enable him to ferret out these crimes and cause these assassins and disturbers of the public peace to be brought to justice.

JOHN L. BEVERIDGE,
Governor.

Does the gentleman from Illinois mean to invoke the power of the Federal Government to guarantee to the people of his State, where "terrorism and intimidation pervade alike the civil authorities and private citizens," a republican form of government? Will he apply the doctrines enunciated in his report on the condition of affairs in Arkansas to his own State? If to restore peace, order, quiet, and security to the citizens of the State be the motives which prompt him to invoke the aid of Federal power in behalf of Arkansas, he cannot refuse to invite its intervention in the interest of peace and order in his own State.

But, Mr. Speaker, if violence and disorder exist in the South, if their governments are corrupt and unable to afford protection to their citizens, it is the result of that system of Federal interference which has marked the conduct of the Federal Government and characterized your legislation toward that section of the Union ever since the war closed. When the civil conflict ended, the work of demolition and ruin began. States which during the war were declared in the Union, and which armed resistance failed to take out, were by legislative action, stimulated by the magic of reconstruction, released from their Federal bonds, and made the playthings of wild fanatics and impracticable theorists. Under the fingers of reconstruction, their identity as States was destroyed, and out of their substance forms of government were created, sustained by the sword and bayonet, and controlled by the camp followers of the Federal Army. They were turned over as legitimate prey to the vampires and insects bred under the rays of Federal patronage and power. Corruption spread its virus throughout their borders and to-day festers in the bodies of dead Commonwealths slain by usurpation. Ten years have elapsed since the experiment was commenced, and still the sword and fixed bayonet gleam in the faces of a conquered people, whose patience and forbearance, instead of commanding the respect of the conqueror, are rewarded by cruel epithets and threats of punishment as "outlaws" and "banditti."

The country has before it reconstruction with all its glories. The monster evils generated by it stalk abroad and people the fairest portion of our land. Misgovernment, violence, and anarchy are the progeny of the ill-advised policy of treating American freemen of the nineteenth century like barbarians. And does any one ask what has engendered all these evils? The pulling down and setting up of State governments, the putting in and out of State executives, the denial to the people of their right to choose their own governors and representatives without Federal dictation or interference, to assemble peaceably to deliberate on their own affairs, and the using of the sacred trust of government by a political party as a means of indulging sectional and party hate and caprice. This it is, coupled with a disregard of the restrictions placed upon Federal power by the Constitution, and the assumption of powers not therein delegated, that has ushered in the anarchy and misgovernment you now behold in the South, which shame our civilization and disgrace us in the eyes of the civilized world. And for this the authors of reconstruction are responsible.

Condition of Affairs in the South.

SPEECH OF HON. JOSIAH T. WALLS,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the report of the Committee on Affairs in Arkansas and the condition of the South generally.

Mr. WALLS. Mr. Speaker, in attempting to address myself to the condition of affairs in Arkansas and in the South generally, I do so with no intention to misrepresent any class of our people. It would seem to an interested observer of the political affairs of this great nation, one who desires to see her people once more united in one band of brotherhood, one who desires to see this whole land peopled with none but free men and free women, that the time had come when there should be peace assured to all, irrespective of race, color, or the section in which they live; that property is protected everywhere in this broad land; that complete safety is granted to all in expressing their religious and political sentiments; that life and liberty is as safe in one State as in another, and that all classes shall be free.

But I reluctantly confess, after so many long years of concessions, that unless partisan and sectional feeling shall lose more of its rancor in the future than has been experienced in the past, that unless we shall ere long reach that point in our history when a full comprehension of the true mission of the result of the war will be plain to all public men regardless of party affiliation, Arkansas, Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi will not be the only States in this Union in which fundamental law will be disregarded, overthrown, and trampled under foot, and in which a complete reign of terror and anarchy will rule supreme as it does to-day in Arkansas. But every southern State will follow their example. It was sincerely and earnestly desired I believe by every person who remained loyal to the flag of our country that when the States lately in rebellion had accepted the condition by which they were readmitted into the Union, peace, prosperity, and good feeling had been secured and the results of the war accomplished. For one I desired and still desire better feeling among our people in the South, and here in my place, I appeal to those who claim to be the intelligent and property-holders of that section of our common country to stay their acts of oppression, and in the language of the concluding remarks of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them." But if our experience in the future is to be that of the past, appeals are all in vain; but we shall not cease to appeal until we shall have reached the true sentiment of the American people all over this land.

I am aware that emancipation and enfranchisement of the negro and his devotion to the Union as well as to those whom he believed to be his friends, are made the pretext for dissatisfaction, and with which gentlemen like the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] unreconstructed as he is, expects to reach from the bar of the Senate of the United States, or somewhere else, the great public opinion in these United States.

But it will be remembered that this all-powerful public opinion is the jury in the pending case; and I am of the opinion that when the American people are honestly made acquainted with the true condition of affairs in the South, that when their attention is called to them, they will clearly understand the different reports which contain the true condition of the Southern States, and which present clearly the intention of those who complain loudly about the distraction of the colored laborer of the South by those who may choose to go there to be their fixed purpose to "gain," as they say, "by the ballot that which we lost by the bayonet." This cannot successfully be denied, as it is well known that the democratic newspapers in the South teem daily with such sentiments.

But the grave question that presents itself to the American people, especially those who remained loyal to the Union, is, what was it that this class of people lost by the bayonet that they now expect to gain by what they call the ballot? I hear the answer echoed, by the bayonet we lost our power and our human property, and by the ballot we shall regain what we lost by the bayonet.

It will be remembered that they failed to extend slavery as they desired to do, and finally lost them in the States where they were allowed to hold them under some shadow of law. It will also be remembered that they appealed to arms for the open and avowed purpose of overthrowing or dissolving the Union. Failing in this, is it their intention and purpose to obtain control of the General Government, reinstate and extend slavery in some shape, or overthrow or dissolve the Federal Union? These are two of the things that were lost by their bayonets. Do they intend after their accession into power to vote themselves pay for the slaves emancipated by the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, to fix upon the National Government the Confederate States debt, to repeal the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution? These are questions of great moment to the loyal people of these United States and should command their immediate attention.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] is loud in his defense of what he calls the virtue and intelligence of the South, and finds an excuse and a just provocation for the murders, assassinations, and outrages committed by those whom he defends, which you will observe by the following:

An ignorant race, just emancipated from slavery, daily taught hatred to the southern whites, and by appeals to color prejudices made audacious and aggressive in their hostility, will not long be restrained by considerations which move an enlightened and cultured race.

I wish to state to the House and the country that I have been connected with every political canvass made in the South since reconstruction, and all the appeals to race, color, and the daily teachings of one class of people to hate the other have invariably come from democratic orators and their friends; and I am amply borne out in this assertion by the following extract from the platform adopted by the White League in Saint Marys, on the 13th of July:

We enter into and form this league for the protection of our own race against the daily increasing encroachments of the negro, and are determined to use our best endeavors to purge our legislative, judicial, and ministerial offices from such a horde of miscreants as now assume to lord it over us.

That to accomplish this end we solemnly pledge our honor to each other to give our hearty support to all that this league may determine by a majority of votes cast at any regular meeting, and to aid to the utmost of our ability in carrying out such measures as it may adopt; that we do not reject or condemn any white man for his political opinions, so that he joins us in the one grand object we may have in view.

The following is from the platform of the White League adopted at Alto on the 11th of July:

That we regard it the sacred and political duty of every member of this club to discountenance and socially proscribe all white men who unite themselves with the radical party, and to supplant every political opponent in all his vocations by the employment and support of those who ally themselves with the white man's party; and we pledge ourselves to exert our energies and use our means to the consummation of this end.

Sir, here in my place I ask is there any place in the history of our country where it can be found that the colored people in any State or county of this land have banded themselves together by such pledges into black leagues to overthrow legislative, judicial, and ministerial offices? The answer is emphatically No! And the argument of the Senator falls to the ground for naught. But in the face of these and other glaring facts let the people, the loyal people of the United States, hear the Senator's defense of and excuse for murder, assassination, and outrage:

Ah, sir, is it just, in view of these terrible truths, which cannot be disproved, to judge a people assassins and murderers because of disturbances inevitable to such a situation? Is it just to condemn a great people—and I profess to belong to a great people, and no tinge of shame has ever mantled my cheek because I belong to that people—is it just, I ask, to condemn them upon the inevitable isolated outbreaks, however wrong or bloody; upon these fitful events of passion, however extreme? I repeat, their provocations have been infinite; the black people arrayed against them by self-seeking political tricksters, slandered by those who claim to represent them; placed under the bond of a powerful government, governed by men notoriously corrupt, robbed by adventurers supported by power, and goaded to madness by brutal licenses.

Sir, there is no better evidence of the hatred engendered by those who claim to be the virtuous and intelligent of the South than is shown in this labored effort of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] to array the white people of this whole American Union against four millions of lately emancipated colored people. Sir, is it just, I ask, nay is it honorable or brave or logical in an American Senator, who boasts so loudly of being the representative of a virtuous, cultured, and great people, to seek to fire the hearts of a powerful nation by gross misrepresentation against a class of people once their slaves? Is it plausible to suppose that the colored people are guilty of one-tenth of the imaginary crimes with which they are charged after one has sought to acquaint himself with the facts in connection with the true condition of affairs in the South? Sir, in the face of the living truth, in not one page of the history of our country, indited as it may be by partial historians, can it be found in fact that the colored people at any time banded themselves together for the purpose of arraying themselves against the white people of the South.

Sir, when I say that we cherish no animosity toward those who were once our masters, I speak for all the colored people of this broad land. Yet we demand that our lives, our liberties, and our property shall be protected by the strong arm of the Government, that gives us the same citizenship that it gives to those who it seems would, if it were possible, sink our every hope for peace, prosperity, and happiness into the great sea of oblivion.

Sir, there is yet living, conclusive testimony, which forms the most conspicuous pages of the history of the late war, to show that the colored people did not and do not entertain or cherish any ill-feeling or bitterness against those who once held them as their property. It will be admitted by every fair-minded man, North or South, that there was not a time during that long and bloody war that the colored people could not have swept as it were from existence the women, children, the aged and the infirm, who were intrusted to their care while all of the able bodied of the slave oligarchy were arrayed in arms for the open and avowed purpose of destroying the Union or perpetuating the power of slavery.

Sir, it is with pride and the most profound pleasure that I can refer this self-styled virtue and intelligence of the South to these humane acts of a Christian people, and which stands to-day, and will stand as long as there is a vestige of the archives of this nation, and as a living refutation of the baseless charges and slanders that are sent out from these Halls for no other purpose than to fire the hearts and to imbitter the prejudice of the northern people against four millions of comparatively helpless people. Is it brave, I ask, in one who prides himself as being an American Senator and a Christian gentleman, to so grossly misrepresent the growing good feeling between both classes in the South, the result of which he knows will have the inevitable tendency of perpetuating the oppressions of the weaker class and the continuance of an unsettled condition of society generally? Sir, why not let the issues and the result of the war be remembered among the things of the past?

I appeal again to history for argument to show that the unsettled condition of affairs in the Southern States is not caused by the black people arraying themselves against the white people of that section of the country, but that it is the same old spirit that inspired the late war, and that the seeming hatred and fear of the ignorance of the colored people is only used in the Halls of Congress for political purposes, by which certain elements that failed to obtain success in the late conflict between the States, may yet succeed.

The following is from the Enterprise of the 6th of August, published at Franklin, Saint Mary's Parish:

We ask for no assistance, we protest against any intervention. We own this soil of Louisiana by virtue of our endeavor, as a heritage from our ancestors, and it is ours, and ours alone. Science, literature, history, art, civilization, and law belong alone to us, and not to the negroes. They have no record but barbarism and idolatry, nothing since the war but that of error, incapacity, beastliness, voudouism, and crime. Their right to vote is but the result of the war, their exercise of it a monstrous imposition and a vindictive punishment upon us for that ill-advised rebellion. Therefore are we banding together in a White League army, drawn up only on the defensive, exasperated by continual wrong, it is true, but acting under Christian and high-principled leaders, and determined to defeat these negroes in their infamous design of depriving us of all we hold sacred and precious on the soil of our nativity or adoption, or perish in the attempt. Come what may, upon the radical party must rest the whole responsibility of this conflict; and as sure as there is a just God in heaven these unnatural, cold-blooded, and revengeful measures of reconstruction in Louisiana will meet with a terrible retribution.

The following is from the Natchitoches Vindicator of July 18, addressed to colored citizens:

The white people intend to carry the State election this fall; this intention is deliberate and unalterable, from the fact that their very existence depends upon it, and that you may enjoy the blessings which will naturally follow such an event, blessings made doubly sweet when you know that you were partly instrumental in bringing them about, we desire your co-operation, and we simply ask you, will you assist us in redeeming your State from the degradation and ruin she is now in, or will you follow still the advice of those who have placed her thus? Take time to answer it, and let your mind, should you decide affirmatively, be at rest for your future welfare and happiness. We propose to do for you more than any party has yet done for you. On the other hand, should you imagine that the teachings of your former rulers is correct, and you elect to attempt, for it will only be an attempt, to continue their rule, then you must take the consequences. For we tell you now, and let it be distinctly remembered that you have fair warning, that we intend to carry the State of Louisiana in November next, or she will be a military Territory.

The following is from the Minden Democrat:

The remedy for all the evils that afflict our State, and every southern State under negro and carpet-bag rule, is very simple. The incendiaries who flood our country at the approach of every election must be looked after; the proceedings of midnight gatherings in dark and gloomy places must be known. Incendiary teachings of the carpet-baggers and scalawags to inflame the minds of the negroes must not be tolerated again.

The following is from the Mansfield Reporter of July 4 and July 11:

There is nothing to be gained by pleadings or concessions, but everything is within our reach, if we will move forward and grasp it. Let our actions be such that everybody will know what we want, and let them see that we are in earnest and are determined to carry out the programme regardless of the consequences.

The lines must be drawn at once, before our opponents are thoroughly organized; for by this means we will prevent many milk-and-cider fellows from falling into the enemy's ranks. While the white man's party guarantees the negro all of his present rights, they do not intend that white carpet-baggers and renegades shall be permitted to organize and prepare the negroes for the coming campaign. Without the assistance of these villains the negroes are totally incapable of effectually organizing themselves, and unless they are previously excited and drilled, one-half of them will not come to the polls, and a large per cent. of the remainder will vote the white man's ticket.

The following is from the Alexandria Democrat of July 15:

The people have determined that the Kellogg government has to be gotten rid of, and they will not scruple about the means, as they have done in the past.

The following is from the Shreveport Times of July 29:

There has been some red-handed work done in this parish that was necessary, but it was evidently done by cool, determined, and just men, who knew just how far to go; and we doubt not if the same kind of work is necessary it will be done.

We say again that we fully, cordially approve what the white men of Grant and Rapides did at Colfax; the white man who does not is a creature so base, that he shames the worst class of his species. We say again we are going to carry the election in this State next fall.

If the Federal Government again strikes them down then let the infamy of the deed rest upon the shameless despotism that has arisen out of the malignancy and hate of the northern people, beneath whose withering influence no sentiment of liberty can survive; under whose policy of meanness, cowardice, and hate every community that does not worship it must be trampled in the dust, and every civilization that does not pay tribute to it blasted by its curse.

This extract is from the Opelika Times of June 29, 1874, and is one of the resolutions adopted by the democratic convention of Lee County:

Resolved, That all persons, whether white or black, who are the least in sympathy with the so-called civil-rights bill, or who shall in anywise lend aid to those who indorse or countenance said bill, shall be regarded by the white men of Lee as the political and social enemies of the white race.

And again:

EQUAL RIGHTS IS LIBERTY.

[From Opelika Times, August 22, 1874—old whig.]

Let every man, whether white or black, receive that which, according to measure, he is entitled to. Give to the white man as he merits, and give to the black man as he merits. If the white men of Alabama, by reason of their higher civilization and larger experience in the management of the complicated machinery of government, be the more reliable guide and governor of the State, let them have the rule. If they pay the taxes and bear the burdens, they alone have the right to dictate the terms of their imposition. The white man's "life, liberty, and property," sacredly guarded by his rule of superior intelligence and larger statesmanship, gives fuller and more certain protection to the "life and liberty" of the negro, (who has no property to protect.) And thus it is most manifest that the doctrine of "equal rights" will exclude the negro from the legislative halls of Alabama, he having no property-interest in the State and being a non-tax-payer. The revenue laws of Alabama involve the most vital questions, and only those to be affected thereby should be heard on the subject, according to the doctrine of equal rights. It is arrogant and flagrantly insulting for an ignorant pauper black man to insist upon governing a class of men over whom he has neither the power to control nor the instinct to protect. "Equal rights," enforced by negro domination, is an "unsophisticated lie."

And again, from the same source, of September 30:

The most potent agency that is within the compass of our using to teach the radical the iniquity of his machinations, and to compel him to respect the claims of civilization and the imperious wants of the people, is the withdrawal of our moneyed support. Let his ship ply without a cargo or rot unmanned in a breezeless ocean. Let his door of commerce stand open and neglected, with the blood of a slaughtered country sprinkled upon its lintel, a curse upon and a warning to venality. Touch him not, nor his goods, nor his cattle, nor anything that he has. Let him dance to his own piping, and count no profits from the hard earnings of a people he has sought to destroy and a race that he has abandoned and a section of country that he has scandalized by living in it. The adder that stings should find no warmth in the bosom of the dying victim. The man who curses woman, children, race, country, and his God may not hope for Apollo's laurel until he first finds absolution in the sackcloth of repentance. Reparation these radical scalawags can never make, but further scourging of the people they can cease, and we can force them by non-intercourse, if they yield not to entreaty. Free thought, free speech, and free action are only constitutional guarantees so long as their exercise promotes the good of the body-politic. The freedom of action and thought and speech of Titus Oates and Benedict Arnold were outside the protection of the Magna Charta. The Constitution ostracizes freedom when it becomes licentious, and freemen when they become traitors and marplots. Honesty (if it be possible for a scalawag) is no protection, nor even an excuse, for the hand of an assassin. The thing done is measure of transgression in politics, without respect to the motive of doing it. Politically considered, an honest radical is just as culpable as a dishonest one. They are alike enemies to civilization and the South, with all her interests, and our last and only means to be used for their overthrow is to fall back upon the old Wesleyan doctrine to "prefer one another in business."

If there be a colored man who is willing to recognize the necessity of putting Alabama under the rule of intelligence he becomes our friend, and he should be preferred as tenant of our houses, cabooses on the farm, drayman upon the streets, sexton of the church, and in every way right and proper sustained and built up. Merchants, mechanics, and tradesmen of every character have a right to expect and demand support from and at the hands of those with whom they are allied in this great struggle for reform, while the radical cannot have the effrontery even to ask a "fish" without the rational expectation of receiving a "stone." Every man who sustains a scalawag individually contributes to building up radicalism. The way to kill the party is to put upon "short allowance" its individual members. The sea is open—the sky is beautiful—victory is ours!

Then a short editorial from the same paper:

All of the good and prominent of Alabama are for the white man's party. Outcasts, libelers, liars, hand-cuffers, and traitors to blood are for the negro party. Decide where you will place yourself in November.

To give further tone to the sentiment of the "white man's" party in Alabama, the Montgomery News reprinted the following:

BOB TOOMBS HAS FINISHED HIS RECORD.

[Atlanta Herald, August 13.]

In a conversation with General Toombs yesterday, this reporter asked him if there was any truth in the rumors that he was going to run for Congress from this district.

"Not a word of it, sir," says the old veteran. "I have been asked to run by a great many gentlemen in my district; but if every man, woman, and child in this district was to rise up and press it upon me, I would not take it. I hate the Government of the United States, and would give my life to overthrow it. Hence, sir, as a gentleman, I could not accept office in its service. It's a question of honor with me. I hate the Government, and I despise its disciples. I would not sit with the men who are at present in Congress.

"If I were admitted, I should soon be expelled; for I should rise at the first opportunity and denounce as utterly fraudulent the infamous amendments. This would not be tolerated as orthodox, and I would shake the dust of the Senate from my feet again."

"You will never go to Washington again, then, sir?"

"No, sir. My chapter of life at Washington is closed forever. I don't desire to add anything to it, nor to blot one vote or one word from it. Indeed, I could not hope to help my reputation by it very much. A man who spends the period of his life from thirty to fifty-five years of age, as I did, in senatorial service, cannot hope to improve his record or brighten his history by trying it again fifteen or twenty years thereafter. I served my people to the best of my ability for twenty-five years. I will stand on that."

Verily we say it is a splendid record to stand upon. General Toombs could get the nomination in the fifth at any time he wants it, by simply reaching out his hands and taking it. Still, his history as written upon national pages is so lustrous that it would seem a pity to add one syllable to it.

We stand squarely with General Toombs, as a matter of personal sentiment and principle in which we have the right to indulge, until the people of the United States shall sufficiently regain their self-respect to throw off radicals and radicalism. Any sort of divided responsibility with those thieves and traitors and corruptionists and bloody fratricidal murderers, we will resent and resist. We will have no part in the administration of a government with unprincipled people. Better to starve in poverty than to submit to the association. But when reason and conservatism shall again prevail in the United States, it would afford us satisfaction, and perhaps a peculiar pride, to serve the people at Washington.

And the Mobile Register the following:

[Louisville Jeffersonian Democrat.]

He did not get in upon his own motion. He was not originally an agitator about either political or social "rights." There was no struggle on his part, during which time he would of necessity have been to some extent educated to become a citizen and a voter. What he is now he is not quite personally responsible for. It was forced upon him, and he, till it was accomplished, was merely a passive instrument in the hands of the whites who came to his rescue, and brought him his wonderful deliverance from slavery, and thrust him unprepared into the paradise of equal political rights with the whites.

He did not and cannot understand, however "rights" are come to, that they have their predicate in duties. Therefore, when left to himself, he goes about regardless of the rights of others, to live and act in an indolent, insolent, and lawless manner. He has no idea either of personal or political self-government, and can take no steps in the comprehension of social or political economics.

This is not to be wondered at. He is a low order of the human species. As a race he has made no history at any time in the world. He attained to the greatest state of reproduction, and came to the highest social order, personal comfort, and peace and labor in the Southern States under the mastery of the whites. But he was far from being civilized, and in nowise, either from desire or self-control, fitted to be suddenly converted into a citizen-voter in the highest and most intricate system of government known among civilized men.

To thrust him into such a state and impose its duties and responsibilities upon him was an outrage upon him for which there is no parallel in the history of any age. It was and is a crime over which the radical party have greatly rejoiced, but which in the times yet to come will assign it to the deepest infamy. Partisan advantage and the impoverishment of the whole country in all its resources and its spirits and morals, as the result of its gross triumph, is the verdict which mankind will soon chronicle against its iniquity in the business of enfranchising four millions of ignorant blacks.

The grave question to be settled at much cost is, what is to be done to get rid of the negro as a voter? Sooner or later, with more or less dispatch, he will be disfranchised and thrust from out our politics.

White men of all parties and of every grade of religious or moral conviction may as well come quickly to the consideration how to get the negro out of politics with the least confusion and cost. He must go, and there is no profit in standing long upon the order of his going.

You say it is a grave question. So it is, and one that affects the moral and political welfare of the whites to such an extent that the negro must go out of the political problem by legislation on the part of the States, respectively, or go to the wall in a long, bloody, and fierce struggle for his decimation.

We do not like the predicament any better than many who helped to thrust the negro into the difficulty. We propose to deal as kindly with him as possible, but to pursue unflinchingly the course which will lead to a peaceful relegation of him back to the cotton and rice fields, minus the ballot. We do not propose to reduce him to a slave. He shall own himself and be an alien citizen, with the liberty to own property, to sue as well as be sued; but he shall not attempt to do that thing impossible to him—help to govern this country through the ballot-box.

We do not much blame him that he is a voter, and shall altogether forgive him, but never his white coadjutors, if he rather quietly and decently surrenders his ill-gotten hold upon the ballot. We know he will resent our kind interposition in his behalf, and continue to perpetrate outrage after outrage upon morals and public order through a period of many years to come, and he may carry it to an extent which will in very deed precipitate the "war of races," which everybody talks about, anticipates, and so few do anything to prevent.

The question of suffrage belongs to the States respectively. When the reorganized democracy go into office in 1876 each State will be allowed to settle this and all other social and domestic issues for itself and in its own way, without any interference from the General Government. Then, and not till then, can we begin the work of resetting our shattered political and our demoralized social institution upon correct foundations. It will then take a quarter of a century to rebuild and put our ships of state into prosperous sailing order.

In face of these facts what become of the arguments of the opposition, with their terrible tales of falsehood, their reports of negroes arraying themselves against the whites, influenced and urged to do so, as is falsely charged, by the carpet-bagger? Sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not here to apologize for the wrongs that one or two white republicans may have committed in the South; but, sir, I do affirm that the carpet-baggers, assisted by the loyal white and black men of the South, have done more to enact laws and to erect public institutions that conform more closely to the genius of our American ideas of civilization, in the short period of six or eight years under republican administration, than was done by the democratic slave oligarchy in the South prior to the rebellion.

Sir, I present in support of my position, in defense of the outraged and slandered loyal people of the South, an article taken from the Daily Inter-Ocean, a highly respectable and widely circulated newspaper published at Chicago, Illinois, which contains some indisputable truths, and which will go far, in my opinion, to relieve the minds of the loyal people of the North of the impression that the so-called carpet-baggers, Unionists, and negroes have destroyed to utter ruin eleven States in this Union, as would seem to be the case after one had read the apologies for and indorsements of murder, assassination, and outrages contained in the speeches of the opposition on this all-important question. What shall be done by the General Government to protect the loyal people in the South?

The article reads as follows:

We publish elsewhere in this paper a letter from a northern man, late a resident of the South, in which he thanks the Inter-Ocean for the stand it has taken in regard to southern affairs, and relates some of his own experience in Arkansas. Among other things our correspondent speaks of the advancement made by the latter State while under republican rule, and says: "In thirty-five years the democrats built thirty-seven miles of poor railway, opened twenty-five sickly schools, and built a worthless State-house. In six years the republicans built one thousand miles of railway, deaf and dumb and blind asylums, an agricultural college, thousands of school-houses," &c. Yet the men who have done this—our correspondent among the number—are driven out of the State as if they were the bane instead of the leaven of the community.

We have heretofore adverted to the blundering stupidity of the southern people in permitting this warfare to go on against immigrants. There is not a particle of doubt that had northern men been welcomed—nay, if they had even been let alone—every southern State would by this time have nearly doubled its population and quadrupled its capital. There are thousands of sensible southerners who deplore this outrageous ostracism of northern men, and, as far as they dare to do so, oppose it; but they are overawed by the reckless gangs of freebooters who have made themselves a terror in nearly every southern State, and absolutely nothing remains but to put an end to this lawlessness by the strong arm of the Federal Government.

The statistics regarding the establishment of schools in the Southern States, to which our correspondent refers, are very interesting. To go a little further with Arkansas: Though the State received 928,000 acres of land from the General Government in 1836 in aid of free education, not a free school was established until after the war; and to the honor of the black race be it said, the first public school-house in Arkansas was built by freedmen in 1864. At the end of the six years of republican control there were 1,292 public school-houses and nearly 3,000 free schools. Georgia had no free schools before the war, but in the short period that the republicans had control of affairs 816 schools were established, in which were taught 40,000 pupils. The schools began to languish on the return of the democrats to power, and in one year ten school-houses and one church used as a school-house were burned. The free schools were generally discontinued in 1872. In 1867, under republican supervision, efficient free schools were established in Tennessee, and in twenty-two months nearly 4,000 schools had been started. The first report after the State went into the hands of the democrats shows that but 478 of these schools remained. In Granger County, in 1869, there were forty-six white and eight colored schools, with upward of 4,000 white and 400 colored pupils. In 1872 the superintendent reports: "Three schools; no school-tax rated." Under republican rule Texas had 1,921 schools, with 84,000 pupils. In 1873, under democratic rule, these had diminished to 85 schools, with 2,913 pupils! When Mississippi was reconstructed she had no free schools. In three years, under republican rule, over 2,000 school-houses were built and over 3,000 schools organized.

So we might proceed with other Southern States. As with railways and public improvements, so with schools, churches, and every scheme to elevate and improve the people. The democratic party of the South is the foe of all plans for spreading information to-day as it was in 1860. It is this dense ignorance which seems to keep alive animosity, and leads the clay-eaters of Tennessee and the half-savage residents of Upper Louisiana and Texas to feel alarm at the approach of the Yankee school-marm, and be ready to unite and drive her and her dangerous heresies out of the country.

A more clear and correct statement of the disposition exercised by the southern democrats, who might have controlled the political affairs of the South from the beginning of reconstruction up to the present hour, could not have been presented to the public. They had the opportunity to make the colored people their political friends by assuring them by constitutional and legislative enactments that they would be protected in their freedom and that the right of suffrage and the right to participate in governmental affairs was as secure to them as it was to the whites. There would have been no real cause to suspect them, if they would have only abstained from enacting under their policy of reconstruction in 1865 such oppressive laws, laws that will ever stand as an index as to what they will do if they should again obtain control of this Government, laws that would virtually reinstate slavery in a different form, that continued in force the whipping-post and the pillory. It is eminently proper, in my opinion, to submit here some of the enactments made by the Legislature of Florida in 1865.

Sir, I do not submit these terrible facts for the purpose of imbittering or impeding the progress of the growing good feeling that is fast making its appearance among both classes in many sections in the South, but to show beyond successful contradiction the reason why the colored people did and do honor and support those of the white race who respect them as being human and capable of being as cultivated, virtuous, and intelligent a people as they are themselves when endowed with the same rights and advantages.

Extract taken from the laws enacted by the Legislature of Florida, which assembled under the constitution adopted on the 7th of November, A. D. 1865—section 12 of an act prescribing additional penalties for the commisson of offenses against the State, and for other purposes, approved by the governor January 15, 1866:

Be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any negro, mulatto, or other persons of color to own, use, or keep in his possession or under his control any bowie-knife, dirk, sword, fire-arms, or ammunition of any kind, unless he first obtain a license to do so from the judge of probate of the county in which he may be a resident for the time being; and the said judge of probate is hereby authorized to issue such license upon the recommendation of two respectable citizens of the county, certifying to the peaceful and orderly character of the applicant; and any negro, mulatto, or other person of color so offending shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall forfeit to the use of the informer all such fire-arms and ammunition, and in addition thereto shall be sentenced to stand in the pillory for one hour or be whipped not exceeding thirty-nine stripes, or both, at the discretion of the jury.

Comment is unnecessary.

Section 6 of the same act reads as follows:

Be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall assault a white female with intent to commit a rape, or be accessory thereto, he or they shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer death.

It will be seen at once that any band of ruffians might assault a colored lady with intent to commit a rape with perfect security, and go unpunished.

Section 14 of the same act contains the following:

Be it further enacted, That if any negro, mulatto, or other person of color shall intrude himself into any religious or other public assembly of white persons, or into any railroad car or other public vehicle set apart for the exclusive accommodation of white people, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be sentenced to stand in the pillory for one hour, or be whipped not exceeding thirty-nine stripes, or both, at the discretion of the jury.

The following is taken from an act entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled "An act concerning marriage licenses:"'"

SECTION 1. That if any white female resident within this State shall hereafter attempt to intermarry * * * with any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, she shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 or be confined in the public jail not exceeding three months, or both, at discretion of the jury, and shall moreover be disqualified to testify as a witness against any white person.

These acts, sir, were approved by the governor January 12, 1866.

Section 3 of the same act reads as follows:

Be it further enacted, That every person who shall have one-eighth or more of negro blood shall be deemed and held to be a person of color.

These are but few of the many oppressive and inhuman legislative enactments passed by the Legislature referred to; and as I have said before, attention is not called to them at this time for the purpose of awakening the old animosities, but to prove conclusively to an intelligent people that it is not because the colored people hate or dislike the people who make up the democratic party of the South that they are opposing their accession to power again, but it is because, with the undisputed history of that party before them, we have no guarantee that that party will not enact laws again equally oppressive, inhuman, and tyrannical.

This kind of legislation by the democratic party South was not confined alone to Florida; it extended all over the South. Now I ask is it reasonable to suppose that a people having been held as goods and chattels for two hundred and forty-seven years would rush headlong into the beautiful glittering generalities of the democratic platforms and elevate them to power, when a moment's research into the history of that party would reveal the fact that it was and is the avowed purpose of that party to ignore reconstruction and cling to their old State rights ideas. Sir, daily you hear it loudly proclaimed upon this floor by the enemies of this Government that "reconstruction" in the South caused by the enfranchisement of the negro "is a failure." They go further, and attempt to show that reconstruction is a failure in the South by calling our attention to the unsettled condition of affairs in that unhappy section of our country. But they suggest no remedy for evils that are said to exist, nor do they deny the fact that it is the white-leaguers banded together for the very purpose of overthrowing regularly established State governments by force and fraud.

Ah! look at poor, suffering Arkansas. Read the reports of the majority and minority of the committee that was appointed and sent to that State by an order of this House, and you will see that her rightfully elected officers have been forced from the positions to which they were legally elected, none will deny, by force and fraud; her fundamental law disregarded, overthrown, and trampled under foot; murderers, assassins, and white-leaguers (not black-leaguers) rule supreme; her rightful governor compelled, with his cabinet, to leave the State; her chief judicial officer outraged and menaced with assassination and ousted from office without cause. And yet it is claimed that Congress should not take any action in restoring the legally elected authorities of that State and enforcing the only fundamental law that the State of Arkansas can have a legal claim to, the constitution of 1868.

Sir, I am not one of those that believe that Congress should allow the so-called Garland government to remain in power in Arkansas. To do so in my opinion is a complete recognition of the fact that any one of the reconstructed States can with safety disregard the fundamental provision under which they were admitted into the Union, and render inoperative every provision of their constitutions adopted in accordance therewith.

There are several important features about or connected with this Baxter and Garland revolution to which I desire to call the attention of this House and the loyal people of the United States.

First. The Garland constitution strikes out and ignores entirely every provision of the constitution of Arkansas formed in 1868 that in any way recognizes the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Second. Section 38, article 5, of the constitution of Arkansas of 1868 reads as follows:

The General Assembly shall have no power to make compensation for emancipated slaves.

This provision, like the other one that I have named, has been stricken out by the Garland constitution.

Third. In the constitution of 1868 was a provision which reads as follows:

No person shall be allowed or qualified to sit on a jury who is not a qualified elector. (Section 20, article 15.)

This provision has been stricken out, and the Legislature may now fix such qualification for persons as may suit that body. The evident object is to indirectly prevent colored men from sitting on juries.

Fourth. The striking out of these provisions is not the work of ignorance nor of oversight, as it will be remembered that they relate to prominent issues that have been before the country long ere the war and since.

Fifth. In the organic enactment or constitution of 1868 of Arkansas the following oath of office is prescribed:

I, ——, do solemnly swear that I will honestly and faithfully support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States, the Union of the States, and the constitution and laws of the State of Arkansas.

Sixth. In the Garland constitution the oath of office is changed so as to read—

I, ——, do solemnly swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Arkansas.

Sir, these are important features for the loyal people of this country to look at with fear as to the future stability of this Union.

But let us go a little further, and I have done. Take the evidence of bad faith made in changing the oath of office; the striking out of all provisions asserting that the paramount allegiance of the citizens is due to the Federal Government; the striking out all provisions that assert that no power exists in the people to dissolve their compact with the Federal Government; the striking out of a provision denying the right of secession; the striking out of all provisions asserting that the Federal Government is clothed with power to maintain its existence by force of arms; the striking out of a provision prohibiting the Legislature from compensating for emancipated slaves; the striking out of a provision prohibiting the Legislature from paying any debt or liabilities incurred in support of the rebellion, and let an enlightened, loyal public opinion decide what these things prove.

As I have said, I am not one of those who believe that the people of Arkansas have acquiesced in the adoption of the Garland constitution, nor do I believe that they ever will acquiesce in his usurpation, corruption, outrages, and unparalleled rascalities.

Sir, I do not believe that to put an end to the revolutionary and unconstitional action that has been carried on in Arkansas a general uprising will ensue.

Pass the resolution presented by Mr. WARD from the Committee on the Condition of Affairs in the State of Arkansas; put into operation the common schools; again restore peace to all the people of Arkansas; assure the business men of every kind that there is stability in the State government of Arkansas, and give Garland ten days to retire peacefully to his home, and you will have no further trouble in the South.

All that is required is, dare to do right, and every true American citizen, from the pine forests of Maine to the golden shores of California, from the ice-bound steeps of Alaska to the sunny coast of the Gulf of Mexico, will hail with joy the news that a new rebellion has been nipped in the bud and the country saved.

The Proper Policy of the Government in its Dealings with the South.

SPEECH OF HON. H. L. RICHMOND,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the proper policy of the Government in its dealings with the South.

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, perhaps there has not been for very many years an hour when our country was in a more critical, not to say alarming, condition than it is to-day. Perhaps no Congress has assembled since the war to whose consideration and solution more serious problems were submitted, and from which more was not only expected but rightfully demanded by the people, than the Forty-third Congress. Scarcely had we gathered within these halls and taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution, when the cry for help came up from all the land. How have we, the Representatives of the people, answered that cry? What response have we given? A few short days more and our official life is ended; and the Forty-third Congress will have passed into history and will be remembered, if its legislation has been wise, for its wisdom; if foolish, for its folly. It may, perhaps, be admitted that the people, embarrassed, pressed down, almost crushed in their business relations, their industries perishing and fortunes vanishing, have expected too much from us. But have we done for them, have we done to relieve the country, all that was reasonably within our power to have done? That is the question which we have got to answer when we return to our constituency.

Two great problems have been before this Congress since the first hour of its assembling demanding its most thoughtful consideration; the one growing out of the condition of the finances, the other the pacification of the south. What was proper to be done to relieve the one from embarrassment and secure the accomplishment of the other was the great question of the hour, and should have been so treated. "It must be said," writes a distinguished French author, "and said, whatever men may think of it, that the finances touch everything, help everything, conclude everything. They are in the state what blood is in the veins of the human body; if it circulates, it carries along with it motion and life; if it stops, paralysis and death supervene." How aptly descriptive is this of our case as a people to-day. The life-blood of the nation has in a great measure ceased to circulate, and a general paralysis has settled upon all our industrial and business relations threatening disaster and ultimate ruin if it cannot be arrested.

Panics, money panics, are certainly not very pleasant conditions of society. For seventeen months and more we have been suffering under one more calamitous, I venture to say, than any known to our history. Under its severe inflictions the whole land is clothed in suffering and sorrow; and the painful fact is we see no present relief. We are passing through a fearful winter with no promise for the spring. What have we done to relieve or abate this condition of things? Nothing, substantially nothing; some say worse than nothing. What were the causes of the panic, proximate or remote, I care not now to inquire. But could it have been prevented? I am firmly persuaded that had proper measures been taken by the Government at the proper time it might have been and would have been prevented, or at least greatly mitigated, and the country saved from the fearful calamity that now rests upon it. What was wanted in September, 1873, the time when the panic burst so suddenly upon us, to have prevented it was a temporary enlargement of the currency. The Government then held, as is well known, a "reserve" of $44,000,000. Had this, or the larger portion of it, been at once thrown into circulation there would have been no panic, and no cry for help coming up from those whom we serve.

Financial history places the entire truthfulness of this proposition beyond the realm of controversy. Says Mr. Patterson:

Actual experience, the safest of all teachers, has demonstrated that the cause of all our crises is simply the fact of the currency becoming temporarily insufficient in amount for the requirements of the community, and that the moment this insufficiency is remedied the crisis is at an end.

In proof of this he then gives, in his very excellent volume on the Economy of Capital, detailed accounts of the successive panics in England, from which we gather that the issue of two and a half millions of exchequer bills bearing 5 per cent. interest sufficed to stop the panic of 1793; an issue of two millions of inconvertible notes—mark you, inconvertible—stopped the panic of 1797; an old chest of one-pound notes, for a time hid away and lost among the rubbish and refuse of the bank vaults, was found just in time to stop the panic of 1823; the suspension of the bank act of itself sufficed to stop the panics of 1847 and 1857. Indeed, the remedy for all money panics now in England is to lift the act of 1844 from the bank and permit her to throw out its bills in sufficient amounts to meet all the legitimate demands of the people. It was the timely act of the government in 1857 that saved from bankruptcy and ruin the great American house of Peabody & Co. The firm required assistance to the extent of £800,000 sterling, and the bank, fettered by the act, could not accommodate them. But in the afternoon of the 12th of October, just in time to save their paper from protest, the act was suspended, the bank advanced the firm the required sum, they were saved from financial ruin, and the head of the house subsequently made a magnificent donation to us of $2,100,000 to be held in trust for the support of free schools in the South.

But the remedy was not only in accord with all financial history and experience, it was demanded by the business community, and warranted by public opinion. The very men—I will not be understood, of course, as alluding to any member of the House—the very men who now look to contraction as the only remedy for all our woes, who at every groan of the country cry out, "Another turn of the grindstone," are, many of them, the very men who, in September, 1873, were the most blatant for the reissue of the reserve. But the measure did not at first find favor in the eyes of the Government. It was contrary to law when the object was to save labor from threatened peril. But December came; it was found there was a rapid and heavy falling off in the revenue, and for some reason—I will not say salaries were in danger—men's minds were changed. That which was unlawful in September became lawful in December, and the reserve was drawn upon for $26,000,000. But the proffered aid came too late, and but little if any benefit was derived from it. The reasons for this I do not now propose to discuss.

But the panic is now and yet upon us in all its fearfulness and fury and the question is, What shall we do to stay its progress? Why, sirs, look abroad over the land. What do you see everywhere? Manufacturing establishments idle, machinery rusting and rotting, furnaces blown out and cold, mines unworked, laborers out of employ with wives and children suffering for the want of food, fuel, and raiment amidst all the discomforts of the severest winter we have known for many a year. Now, sir, how shall we again call into life and activity those manufacturing establishments, put miners into those mines, fire into those furnaces, and give our laborers, skilled and unskilled, constant and remunerative employment, so that there may be, of necessity, neither idlers nor want in the land? To me, an old-line, internal-improvement, protective-tariff, Henry Clay whig, the answer seems easy.

It needs no argument to prove that the sudden arrest of all, or nearly all our public improvement, whether carried on by the Government or under corporate authority with or without Government aid, is one of the great causes if not the great cause of the embarrassed condition of the country. Sir, this more than anything else, has extinguished the fires in the furnaces, closed up the mines, and silenced the music of machinery throughout the extent of my grand old Commonwealth. And may not this be affirmed of nearly every State in the Union, at least of every mining and manufacturing State? Now I do not propose that work under Government aid shall be resumed at once on all our public improvements; but what I do aver, and meaning all I say, is that there are great public improvements, national in their character and demanded by the wants of the people to which the Government should lend at least the aid of its credit and lend it now, dark and portentous as is the financial storm which has gathered over our heads. And I say it for the reason mainly that the adoption of such a policy would serve greatly to dissipate the storm. I know it would scatter the clouds from over my own noble State and diffuse the sunshine of prosperity all through her valleys and all over her hills and mountains.

Let us look at the subject for a moment a little more closely. The estimated population of the United States is forty-two million. Statisticians suppose seven million of these are men. Of these it is supposed that one at least out of every seven has been out of employ during the year because they could get no work; that is, a million of men have been for a twelvemonth idle because of the stoppage of our public works and the depressed condition of business in the country. The average value of each man's labor is at least $1.50 a day; so that the aggregate value of the labor of the million is $1,500,000 a day, or $450,000,000 for the year. It follows, then, that had they been employed they would not only have received the $450,000,000, but so much would have been added to the national wealth, for the articles upon which that labor would have been bestowed would have been at least by so much increased in value. Add to this the loss because of the number of women thrown out of employ, and the aggregate is greatly increased. Now, had these men been employed during the year, had they received the $450,000,000, and had that much been added to the aggregate of national wealth, do you suppose we should have heard the cry of hard times? Not a word of it. What we propose, then, is to give them employ through the agency named and kindred agencies.

I do not propose to discuss to any extent the merits of any of the proposed improvements of a national character which have been or may be brought before us for consideration. But there are two to which, for a special reason, I wish for a moment to direct the attention of the House. And first, the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi. To say nothing of the incidental advantages to the whole nation to result therefrom, there are seventeen millions of our population inhabiting the valleys of this great outlet of waters and its numerous tributaries who have a direct and immediate interest therein. Free and easy access to the Gulf is imperiously demanded by their large and rapidly increasing commerce. The mouth of the Mississippi should be opened. The accomplishment of this is not reasonably within the reach of private enterprise. To it national aid should be extended; and if I am not mistaken in the temper of the House, so far as this body is concerned it will be willingly and readily granted. But more particularly I am in favor of giving the credit of the nation, under proper guarantees, in aid of the completion of the great southern line of railroad to the Pacific. I advocate this measure because personally I believe in it and approve of it; and because it is largely desired by the people whom I in part represent. Earnest appeals were made to me in its behalf during the autumn vacation by business men of both parties, representing large mining and manufacturing interests in the State. Petitions numerously signed have come up in large numbers from my district praying that the desired aid be granted.

The reasons which have satisfied me of the utility and entire feasibility of the measure are numerous and weighty. I can only give a summary of the more important ones. The opening up of this great highway of the nation through the most productive of the Southern States, and so on west to the Pacific coast, would bring the cheap and yet rich lands of the Republic throughout all that section within the reach of the laboring poor and hasten the development of its vast territories Southwest and West in the interests of civilization. I favor it—

Because it furnishes an open thoroughfare across the continent, unobstructed by snows, during the whole year;

Because of the great savings it would bring to the Government annually in the transportation of military and Indian supplies, and the power it would place in the hands of the authorities in subduing and controlling the wild Indian tribes of the West;

Because it will secure to our people easy access to the rich mines and other valuable products of Chihuahua, Sonora, and other Mexican states, and increase indefinitely the yield of the precious metals;

Because it would create an active demand for labor and material for its construction and maintenance, put new life and energy into business, and relieve much of the suffering and distress now existing in manufacturing and other districts;

And beyond and above each and all of these, it would do more than any other agency within our reach to conciliate and harmonize the South and reconcile her to the new condition of things. Let me dwell upon this point a moment. Money properly spent, though with seeming lavishness, is many times ultimate economy. It is so in individual transactions, and in the transactions of nations as well. A few millions spent in measures which, while they promote interests national in their character, would serve specially to develop the wonderful resources of the South and make it equally prosperous and happy with the heretofore more favored sections of our common country, will more than anything else allay party jealousies and sectional strife. The military power of the Government should be resorted to only in cases of extreme necessity. I do not say that that necessity has not arisen, or that the Government is wrong in the measures it has been pleased to adopt to compel obedience to the laws and protect the rights of a once subjugated and enslaved but now emancipated race. I have felt it my duty thus far to stand by the Government, and propose to do so still so long as I feel that it acts only in the discharge of an imposed duty. But what I do say is that it is far better and safer and cheaper, and eminently more Christian, to win compliance with the right by the arts of peace than to compel it by the strong arm of force.

Says the New Orleans Times:

> Let the nation do for the South what it has done for the North and West, and a mild-mannered peace will smile all over the land. Build our levees, open our way to the sea, and aid in our great Pacific railway enterprise; in these will be found the means of pacification, far more potent than all the political legislation within the scope of congressional power. In these reflections we but utter the sentiments of all thinking citizens.

So speaks a leading southern journal. And the truth of the philosophy it inculcates is attested by the entire experience of our race. It is but carrying into larger life the religion of the sermon on the mount.

> Peace has her victories,
> No less renowned than war.

The sword has no reformatory power. It may compel obedience, but it can never win confidence and trust. Why, sir, the South is not alone in its suffering. The whole land has for nearly two years been groaning and writhing under a most terrible infliction. What is it that produces panics? The want of bread. And all history teaches that panics, especially bread panics, produce revolutions. No sensible man could have perpetrated a greater blunder than did my friend from New Jersey when he charged the strange results of the elections last fall to the treatment the South had received at the hands of the Administration and of the party in power. It was a strange mistake for one so well read and observant to have made. A little dispassionate examination of the current events of the past year would have revealed to him other and more potent causes for that strange exhibition of human folly. The panic, the condition of the country in all its sections and in all the departments of business life, had made our people wild with apprehensions of still more fearful calamities pending, and through the crazy elections they pitched men pell-mell into the next Congress without knowing whether they stood on their heads or their heels, and not caring a stiver as to who lost or who won.

Says an eminent English writer already referred to:

> Suffering is the great parent of revolution. Seldom if ever has a country been convulsed by political revolution save where the outbreak had been preceded by a period of general distress. The distress so wide spread and apparently mysterious which overspread our own country for twenty years before the passing of the reform bill, as well as for several years afterward, was the agency which gave to that long crisis its exasperation and serious political perils.

And in another connection he speaks of it as the period when "national distress and political agitation were most rife among" them. And says a distinguished writer of our own:

> It is seldom that a reigning party can exist in the presence of general industrial discontent, when all business is paralyzed, capital locked up, and everybody anxious, discontented, and suffering. Woe be to the existing administration!"

I appeal, then, to this side of the House to look well to their laurels, richly earned through sixteen years of glorious history, lest they wither and perish in the presence and because of failure in the discharge of demanded and imperative duty.

And, Mr. Speaker, there is reason in all this. Said Lord Brougham in a speech made in the English Parliament in 1812, speaking of our own country:

> But I freely acknowledge that the sight of one part of America brings to me feelings of envy as an Englishman. I mean the happy distinction that over the whole extent of that boundless continent, from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico and from the Atlantic Ocean westward to the Mississippi, not one pauper is to be found.

Mr. Speaker, that cannot be said of our country to-day, notwithstanding its multiplied resources and vast accumulation of wealth. And why? Why so much penury and want and distress, when an abundance is within our immediate command? Then property was more equally distributed among the masses; now and for a time past property has been leaving the hands of the industrial classes and accumulating in the coffers of capitalists. The rich are becoming richer, and the poor poorer—a condition of things of most fearful prognostication to every one versed in the history of the rise and fall of empires. But such is the increasing tendency of the times. It seems to be the fate of nations, as they grow old and tend to decay, to accumulate property in the hands of the few at the expense and impoverishment of the many. Such is the direct effect of all money panics. The creditor class becomes more nervous and exacting, and the debtor class is most pressed when it is least able to pay. The clamor for specie payments, no matter who perishes, always raised at such times by a discontented moneyed interest, which Edmund Burke calls "the most dangerous of all parties," only serves to hasten the catastrophe. It is in times like these that the people, as they have a right to do, look to their representatives for prompt and intelligent legislation directed to their relief. Disappointed in this, it is not at all surprising that they should hurl from place and power those who have failed in duty and disappointed their hopes in the hour of their greatest need.

But there is another light in which I wish to present the subject. Congress made the panic and therefore it is demandable of it to do all in its power to relieve the people from the embarrassments in which it has envolved them. What I mean is this: Congress has for years encouraged the building of railroads by giving to railroad companies millions of acres of land. Immense quantities of iron and other material were required to build these roads. This led to heavy investments in many of the States, and especially in my own State, in the erection of furnaces, rolling-mills, machine and car shops, and in like enterprises, to meet the demands of the companies in the construction of their roads. These investments, now become profitless, never would have been made; the money would have gone into other business channels but for the encouragement Government gave to those improvements. Laborers were wanted, and large numbers from other lands were induced to come over, who now swell the number of unemployed workmen because of the cessation of these works. And then the panic was hastened and intensified if not actually produced, by the contraction of the currency under the authority of Congress. Congress may have carried its encouragement of these public works too far by its land grants and thero aids rendered. But having done this, having induced these large investments of capital, it is a great wrong, a fraud, in the face of all fair dealing, to leave innocent parties to suffer from its own acts. The plainest principles of duty and honest dealing in human transactions require that Congress should render all proper aid needed to complete those great continental railways and render them productive. By thus doing it will give employment to labor, keep faith with the people, and revive and reinvigorate the decaying business of the country.

A word on a cognate subject. If we wish to infuse life and vitality into all our business transactions, we must afford proper protection to American industry.

The difference of opinion which prevails among men who advocate the doctrines severally of free trade and protection grows out of the different processes of reasoning by which they arrive at their conclusions. The advocates of free trade argue from what they aver to be a changeless law of cause and effect. They start with certain principles which they call fundamental; lay down certain propositions which they declare will work out the same results in all countries and under every condition of business life.

The protectionist proceeds by a different process. He first endeavors to ascertain all the facts of the case, the conditions under which they exist, and their modes of operation, and from a careful consideration of these arrives at his conclusions as to the law by which they are governed. The one reasons from what he finds around him, from the experiences of every-day life, and is the practical, safe, business man; the other, from the dogmas of the study and the recitation-room, and is a mere theorist.

Free trade can exist only between those nations, where all the conditions of traffic are equal, as the cost of labor, the price of capital, &c. The weaker nation in those respects must always suffer more or less in business, intercourse with the stronger in the absence of protective restrictions upon the trade of the latter. It must always be the purchaser, never the seller; always buy, never sell; and just to that extent always the dependent nation.

The end of protection is the guardianship of capital and industry by means of restrictions placed upon freedom of trade. It is defined to be the security of the possibilities of capital and industry. It relieves the crowded and overworked avenues of industry by opening a way for the prosecution of new industries; pursuits which have previously been monopolized by foreign countries to the exclusion of the one which invokes the aid of protection. It is an equalizer of opportunities, a mere compliance with the laws of self-preservation. This it accomplishes by so enhancing the price of foreign commodities by statutory provisions, by the imposition of duties, that the foreigner cannot undersell our own people in their own market. To illustrate: When domestic iron is twenty dollars a ton and the foreign article of no better quality can be sold in our own market at fifteen dollars a ton, we are driven from the market; our furnaces are extinguished, our mines closed, and our rolling-mills silenced. And so with all our domestic productions when they come into competition with the foreign article. And just to the extent that this condition of things prevails our farmers and producing classes suffer, for just to that extent they are deprived or a convenient, a sure, a home market.

There is a mutual dependence and harmony of interests between the industrial classes engaged respectively in mining, manufacturing, and agriculture. The farmer produces simply, and his surplus, over and above what he needs to render his family comfortable, is of little value to him if he can find no market for it. Indeed, for the want of a market, as in some parts of the West, his corn is his cheapest fuel. But just in the proportion that you increase mining and manufacturing, you enhance the value of the products of the farm and to that extent benefit the farmer, by providing for him a better market for all he raises. Thus beautifully and profitably do those three great industries harmonize when properly aided and sufficiently protected by wise legislation. The material condition of that country cannot well be improved where those several industries are flourishing in due proportion. To accomplish this end, to harmonize those great interests, and render their prosecution alike profitable to all engaged therein; in other words, to effectuate that condition of society which will furnish profitable employment to all its members and no excuse for idlers is the duty of every legislator, so far as is in his power.

One word more. No part of our common country, I am persuaded, would be more benefited by a properly adjusted protective tariff, if she is provided with easy access to market, than the South. Her natural resources are immense and of the most varied and valuable character. Her fields are unequaled in the production of the great agricultural staples demanded by the wants of the world; her mountains are clothed and crowned with magnificent forests, the silence of whose solitudes is seldom broken by the sound of the woodman's ax or the song of the workman; unemployed water-powers murmur, dance, and mingle among her hills and through her vales; her broad and beautiful savannas are rich in the most luscious fruits; while beneath the bosom of her virgin soil repose metallic ores of inestimable value.

All that this immense natural wealth needs for its full development is protection against foreign competition and the completion of her great continental railway. It is our duty to her, as well as to the whole country of which she is an integral part, by proper legislation to secure the one and aid in the construction of the other. Sir, I do not propose to shake hands simply across the bloody chasm, not to bridge it over, but to fill it up by approaches from each side until no marks shall be left that it ever had an existence. Then, and not until then, will our country, our whole country, be contented, peaceful, and happy.

Affairs in Arkansas.

SPEECH OF HON. A. WHITE,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the report of the Select Committee on Affairs in Arkansas.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the theory of our government is that all men are created free and equal, and that all political power emanates from the people and that all authority is delegated by them under the forms of law to officials who are the public servants of the people, chosen by them or appointed by those intrusted by them with power to appoint and responsible to the people. In determining their form of government, speaking from a primary stand-point, there is no limitation upon their sovereign will, nor is there any restriction as to the manner of delegating power or the measure or distribution of power the people may choose to delegate.

The manner of ascertaining and determining the will of the people is by a vote of the majority. This is the leading and fundamental rule of our political institutions, that the will of the majority must govern, and that the will of the majority enacted by law is the will of the whole people.

This principle "that the majority must govern" is the only limitation in limine upon the sovereign will of the people. They can confer power and can limit it. They can put limitations upon their own power in any degree or form they may choose, whether it be in primary assemblies, in State Legislatures, or in Congress. The form of our government is not a pure democracy; the people in primary assemblies do not make laws; but it is a representative republic in which the people delegate to individuals chosen by themselves the power to make laws. The laws made by these accredited public agents of the people are as if made by the people themselves, qui facit per alium, facit per se, and have the same authoritative sanction as laws enacted in a "democracy" by the vote of the masses of the people. We have two generic forms of law; one organic or constitutional law, the other statute or legislative law; both of which are made by the people through their delegates—the first in conventions, the latter in State Legislatures and in Congress.

The chief object of conventions is to declare the form of government or to alter the form of government; to establish the officers of government, declare their duties, invest them with authority, and by fundamental law to secure permanency and protection to individual rights by putting limits upon the people themselves in one direction and upon their agents in the other; by restricting the power of the people to change their constitution except in the mode prescribed in the constitution itself, and limiting the power of their representatives to the grants and inhibitions of the constitution. The first is a security against anarchy and licentiousness, the last a protection against usurpation and tyranny.

The delegates of the people in convention assembled is the nearest approach to a pure democracy in our form of government. The convention is in dignity most imposing and in power supreme. Its ordinances bind Legislatures, governors, courts, and people. It creates fundamental law by the consent and authority of the people, binding upon all, and unchangeable except in the manner provided by its own ordinances or by the people themselves through their delegates in convention. The people are as much bound by its provisions limiting their power as are the several Departments of Government; and as all acts of the Legislature in violation of the Constitution are null and void ab initio, and therefore can never be approved or made valid by any ratification whatsoever, so a violation of the fundamental law by the people is null and void, and is incapable of ratification such as to impart to it legal vitality. You may give to it force or it may acquire force, but it is the force of usurpation, not of legitimacy.

In a legal view the obligation of the people to observe the laws which by their constitution they have imposed upon themselves is of equal force with that imposed by the Constitution upon the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary, and in a moral point of view it is stronger, the breach of it is more flagrant, and the consequences more disastrous. The wrong done is without a remedy, and the example is destruction of all government. The principle involved in these self-imposed restrictions by the people in their constitutions was prompted by a wise spirit of precaution against that which history teaches is the weakness and the danger of popular governments, the people themselves. While their deliberate and well-informed judgment is entitled to the highest consideration, the impulses of the people are not always reliable, and their caprices are so fickle that the ingratitude of republics has become proverbial. The people of the most intelligent and cultivated republic that ever existed condemned Socrates without a crime to drink the hemlock, and then erected statues to his memory.

To put a check upon this dangerous tendency, the American people have imposed this restraint upon themselves, giving to it the authoritative solemnity of constitutional enactment, and thus as far as possible stamping it with the impress of inviolability—a defense ordained by the people against themselves, a sure anchorage where their Constitution and Government and laws should rest secure from the assaults of the demagogue, and where the passions, the prejudices, the excitement of the hour could never enter. As we progress in our governmental experience we are being subjected to the same tests, are assailed by the same temptations, and are manifesting the same weaknesses as those who have gone before us.

The people, the dear people, is still the cant of the demagogue; and even in these Halls the question not infrequently is, not what is right, but what is popular; what will the people think of it? I speak not in the spirit of cynicism, but in serious and pointed inquiry. I suggest would it not be more consistent with proper self-respect and with genuine respect for the people themselves for us to maintain the law inviolate, to stand by the right and rebuke and repress the wrong, and rely upon the sober second thought of the people for our vindication, rather than by acquiescence in or concession to hasty and premature popular beliefs to sanction lawlessness and give unction to wrongs? Desirable as the approbation of the people may be, and solicitous as every public man should be to receive it, it is still more desirable to deserve it, and no man can really deserve the approbation of the people for his public acts who has not the approbation of his own conscience.

The importance of adhering to prescribed and time-honored rules, and of looking to the right rather than expediency, is deeply impressed by a thoughtful appreciation of the novelty of the present condition and the grave issues with which we have to deal. From the adoption of the Federal Constitution to 1861 our country was blessed with internal peace. There were party contests, heated sometimes to a high degree; there was party zeal and party rancor, but these grew out of questions of administrative policy and were settled by the ballot-box. The machinery of government moved on, controlled by the successful party and guided by its policy. The Constitution had provided for the peaceful growth of the nation; and as new communities were formed upon our territory, with sufficient population, new States were admitted into the Union upon recognized and settled principles under the provisions of the Constitution with the quiet facility of an ordained and established order of things, without disturbance or commotion other than participation with the nation at large in the party struggles to which I have alluded. These in the main were mere surface agitations, involving no elemental principle of government and unsettling no foundations. All acquiesced in equality of right, in the people as the source from whence the Government derived all its powers, in the sovereignty of law, and in veneration for the Constitution. There were occasionally appeals made in political discussions to fundamental principles, but this was usually for the purpose of strengthening party policy by showing its consonance with them, and not for the purpose of assailing or questioning the principle.

The foundations of our Government were unmoved for seventy years; peace flowed like a river through all our borders; the nation grew in wealth and power, and our people were prosperous, free, and happy. This general condition was subject to one notable exception. There was one conflict of political opinions, which had its origin in some of the conventions which adopted our Federal Constitution, as to the power of the States and the United States, which, then begun, continued with more or less of heat until, spreading over wide-extended communities, centering around certain material interests and social institutions, it finally absorbed all questions of mere party politics, and in 1861 culminated in war between the North and the South. This result, so long delayed by the powerful and numerous peaceful influences which counteracted it, was nevertheless inevitable. It was inherent in the controversy itself. Two systems of government—one national and the other State—each asserting paramount allegiance from the same people, the one maintaining the indissolubility of the Union and the other claiming the right of a State to secede, involved an irreconcilable antagonism, which only made it a question of time when they would meet in collision supported by their respective advocates; and as there was no recognized tribunal under our form of government to which the question could be submitted, appeal to arms—a fearful experience—has confirmed what reason clearly foreshadowed.

There must be supremacy in one or the other of our governments, national or State, which shall be recognized by the people and sustained by public opinion. This is the only state of rest for this vexed controversy; and if one war has not settled it another war will, or it may be that more wars than one will be necessary to its final solution. The more the mind dwells upon this subject the more deeply will it be impressed with the conviction of this portentous truth. Its throes but recently shook the nation to its center. The débris of the ruin it inflicted are strewn over a large portion of our country. The discords it caused yet destroy the peace of States, while its fitful flashings in our political sky admonish the gathering of the elements whose collisions may again burst in the tempest and desolations of war.

The framers of our Constitution did not propose to provide for a condition of civil or internal war. In the nature of things it was repugnant, and though it is not reasonable to suppose that they did not consider such a war as possible, yet there is no express provision in the Constitution for it, nor a priori could there be any express provision for the condition which would result from civil war; nor did the framers of the Constitution anticipate the secession of a State from the Union nor provide for any such condition.

But secession came and then separate State governments in the South, then a southern confederacy, and then civil war; with the war, commotion and slaughter and devastation, and from the war resulted emancipation, the abolition of slavery, reconstruction, and the amendments to the Constitution.

At the close of the war there were eleven States whose governments had thrown off allegiance to the United States, who had formed and acknowledged allegiance to the hostile southern confederacy. These States had to be restored to their position in the Union, and this with the status of the freedman constituted the two great problems which the country had to solve in renewing with these States the relations which subsisted between them and the nation before the war.

Under a profound sense of the difficulties and magnitude of the duty which had devolved upon them, the Congress with deep and solemn earnestness addressed itself to the momentous task. They were called upon to heal the wounds of the war, to restore the broken ligaments of the Union, to uphold and protect the emancipated slaves, to provide for the inauguration of civil governments in the States lately at war with the United States and to provide for the inviolability of the Union and the peaceful, permanent assertion and recognition of the Federal Constitution as the supreme law in those States. As preparatory to readmission of these States, Congress established military governments which should maintain order, preserve rights, and suppress crime until the States should be reconstructed.

In determining the mode of doing this there were among others two serious and difficult questions to be settled. One of these was the political status of the white people who had recently waged war against the Government, and the other was to fix the political status of the manumitted slaves. On the one hand there was felt a great reluctance to impair the rights of the white people as citizens, while on the other it was considered hazardous to invest them with the absolute political control of the Southern States. The newly made freemen had never before had any political rights, and could not be expected to appreciate the importance of a wise and discriminating exercise of those rights or to have the knowledge necessary to such exercise. Congress finally settled the plan of reconstruction by giving to the masses of the white people, upon their taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to maintain the civil and political equality of all men, the right of suffrage, and by bestowing the right of suffrage upon the colored people, thus balancing whatever of disaffection or disloyalty there might remain among the whites by the assured loyalty of the blacks, and giving to the latter, as the weaker of the two races, the power of the ballot to protect themselves against encroachments upon their rights.

Conventions were then held consisting of delegates chosen by the whole people, white and colored, and constitutions framed, and upon these constitutions and the faith of the people of the States, respectively, pledged in most solemn and authentic form to abide by and sustain them, the Congress of the United States readmitted them as States having governments republican in form into full fellowship as States in the Union. Had the Congress found no assurance in these constitutions of their stability, had they contained no limitation upon the power to change them, prescribed no mode and put no conditions guarding against irregularity or licentiousness in changing them; had Congress believed that the safeguards in these constitutions might be disregarded and new constitutions and governments set up by a party or by the people of these States without regard to the modes prescribed by their constitutions for changing them, or in utter disregard of such modes and of the principles of law governing such action, as settled by the established practice of the American people and recognized by the courts, it is very certain that Congress would not have admitted them to representation in Congress.

The constitutions as they were constituted the republican form of government which was guaranteed by Congress to these several States, and every provision in each of those constitutions is equally binding with every other and no one of them can be violated or disregarded without impeachment of the compact between these States and the Congress of the United States when they readmitted them to their position as States in the Federal Union, or without trampling under foot the organic law of the State itself. Of what avail were the precautions of Congress giving to all the people, white and colored, of these States a voice in framing their constitution and securing their rights by the solemn enactments of their organic law, confirmed by the acceptance of the same by Congress, if in disregard of its provisions and of established usages the Constitution itself may be set aside and annulled?

The controlling popular element in Arkansas at the date of the reconstruction acts was regarded as dangerous, if not certainly vicious in a political sense. It was known that the loyal element, embracing comparatively but few whites and consisting mainly of the newly emancipated slaves, could not contend successfully with the large proportion of the white people in political struggles; hence the checks as to the manner of changing it were ingrafted upon the constitution to give permanency and assurance to the political relations and organizations which were ordained by the constitution which was framed under the reconstruction acts, and which was accepted by Congress on admitting the State to representation in Congress as the form of government of the State of Arkansas—

A constitution (believed to be and accepted as such) stable and permanent, not to be worked upon by the temper of the times, nor to rise and fall with the tide of events.

In both of these important points of view, reason and law combine in demanding an adherence to the established modes and to the provisions of the constitution of Arkansas in any proceeding to revise or change that constitution. As we proceed in the consideration of the subject, unless I have wholly misconceived their import, subsequent events will impart peculiar emphasis to these demands.

I will read the thirteenth article of the constitution of Arkansas of 1868:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 1. Any amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the General Assembly, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each of the two houses, such proposed amendment shall be entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and referred to the Legislature to be chosen at the next general election, and shall be published as provided by law for three months previous to the time of making such choice, and if in the General Assembly so next chosen as aforesaid such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each house, then it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to submit such proposed amendment or amendments to the people in such manner and at such time as the General Assembly shall provide; and if the people shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of the electors qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution of this State.

SEC. 2. If two or more amendments shall be submitted at the same time, they shall be submitted in such manner that the electors shall vote for or against each of said amendments separately.

There are only two modes of changing or revising a State constitution in American usages and under our institutions; one is by the people themselves; the other is by the authority of the constitution. In the former the call for a convention must be made by the people themselves; in the latter the call must be made in strict conformity to the modes prescribed in the constitution. The whole range of organic law is above and beyond the power of the Legislature. Through it the Legislature is created, by it invested with powers which are themselves limited by the constitution, both in the subject-matter and scope of their exercise. The Legislature can make laws; they can do nothing else, unless by an express grant of power in the constitution. Members of the Legislature are the representatives of the people in a delegated not in a primary capacity. They are the official agents of the people, to exercise the powers and perform the duties prescribed for legislators by the constitution; but beyond these they cannot authoritatively go.

The calling a convention is not a legislative act. It is no exercise of the law-making power. The call for a convention by a Legislature in the absence of an express provision in the constitution giving the power to make the call is ultra vires. It could just as well be made by the governor or by the judges of the supreme court. It is neither executive, legislative, nor judicial in its character, and therefore is not one of the powers which are delegated to them by the constitution; but it is a power reserved by the people to themselves for their own protection. This is the great conservative principle of our peculiar form of government—written constitutions. It is this which imparts stability and gives assurance to our political institutions. This constitutes the fundamental difference between our governments and the republics that have gone before us, consumed and buried in the fires of contending factions; between our constitutions and the constitutions in Europe and in Central and South America, which within the century have vanished before the hot breath of the excited populace or infuriated mobs.

So long as the foundations are unmoved there is something upon which the superstructure of government can stand, and if overthrown, something upon which to rebuild. With this conviction impressed by the teachings of the past experience of popular governments, the American people have kept their constitutions within their own control, and when they have delegated to the Legislature the power even to amend them, they have done so under restrictions which referred such amendments to the people, to pass upon them by a direct vote of acceptance or rejection. The constitution of Arkansas of 1868 is strongly marked with this distinctive American idea of guarding jealously their organic law and keeping it within the control of the people themselves.

The thirteenth amendment, to which I have referred, cautiously guarded the people of Arkansas against hasty or ill-advised changes in their fundamental law. The power to propose amendments was given to either House of the General Assembly, but it required a majority of the members elected in both houses, taken by yeas and nays entered upon the journals, to pass it. It was then to be referred to the Legislature to be chosen at the next general election by publication for three months before the election, and if a majority of the members elected to each house of this succeeding Legislature should be in favor of the proposed amendments, then they should be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors, and if ratified by them the amendments became parts of the constitution.

It is scarcely possible to consider these provisions without being impressed with the deliberate purpose and wise forethought which prompted them, or to look to subsequent events without recognizing the necessity that demanded them. It is not logically conceivable that the framers of this constitution, thus carefully restricting the power to propose amendments to the constitution to two successive Legislatures, should have left it in the power of one Legislature to call a convention to abrogate the entire constitution. Such a conclusion would certainly be inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution, as well as in conflict with the general principle which I have stated.

I am aware that there is some conflict of opinion as to the question of power of a Legislature to call a convention to revise the constitution of a State. But this conflicts grows mainly out of precedents established in quiet and peaceful times, and the overwhelming weight of judicial authority and of the later precedents are in favor of the proposition that the people alone have the power to call such convention; and that in the absence of an express provision in the constitution conferring the power upon the Legislature to call a convention the call must be submitted in the first instance to the people, and they must determine by vote whether they will call a convention or not.

The great evils of popular governments are "hasty legislation, excessive legislation, and partisan legislation," and to prevent or alleviate these evils these restrictions upon the power to change the constitution are imposed. The danger from these evils has never been so great as at this time. The condition of a large portion of our country, inflamed by war, then humiliated by defeat, irritated by reconstruction, and now exasperate, from a pronounced war of races, renders it of paramount importance that this salutary principle should be maintained and enforced by Congress in determining the validity of the present so-called State government of Arkansas.

The call for the convention which framed the constitution of 1874 was made by the Baxter legislature, and not by the people. This body, styling itself the Legislature, was organized under such circumstances as invite the strictest scrutiny. Was it a Legislature is certainly a most material fact in every point of view, and in one it would be a controlling fact. If it was not a Legislature, then the very fountains of its legitimacy are closed out, and the constitution upon which the Garland government rests is a nullity and the government a naked usurpation.

The General Assembly of Arkansas under the constitution of 1868 consisted of eighty-two members of the house of representatives and twenty-seven senators. These representatives were created by the qualified electors chosen at an election held at a time and places fixed by law. They could be created by no other power than the qualified electors, in no other mode than by an election, and at no other time and places than those fixed by law. Their term of office began on the day of election and continued for two years; and during that time, two years from the 5th of November, 1872, no new member could be elected from the counties they respectively represented unless vacancies had occurred in the places filled by them. An election or appointment to an office which is already filled is a nullity, or to put it more nearly in legal phraseology, an appointment to fill a vacancy in office when none exists is a nullity.

Of the members elected to the General Arsembly which convened January 6, 1873, Baxter appointed between thirty and forty members of the house of representatives and senate to office, and there were some six or seven who resigned. The seats of these members were assumed by Baxter to be vacant, and he issued his proclamation on the ——— day of ———, ordering elections to be held in the several counties to fill the vacancies. Soon after he issues another proclamation or public notice that the Legislature wo '' under no circumstances be assembled.

The elections were held, and the Legislature soon after was convened in extraordinary session by the governor and the persons thus elected were admitted as members, and with those members of the Legislature elected on the 5th of November, 1872, who were admitted to this extraordinary assembly constituted a quorum, but without these new members there was not a quorum; in other words, there was no Legislature. If in fact there was not a quorum in either house, then there could be no organization of the General Assembly; and if there was no General Assembly to issue the call for a convention, then the election at which the vote was taken calling a convention was without authority of law and void.

This is a controversy between the two constitutions—a question which one of the two, the constitution of 1868 or the constitution of 1874, is the constitution of the State of Arkansas; and each must trace its source to and confirm itself by law or else it must fall. It is not a case in which a de facto government or de facto members of the General Assembly is in any way involved. Upon each is devolved the burden of showing that it is in law the constitution of the State of Arkansas. Both cannot be; one is legal and the other illegal, one valid and the other invalid; one is the constitution of Arkansas and the other is a nullity. This is the attitude in which the question presents itself before us and upon which we must act.

By section 34 the General Assembly shall declare the cases in which any office shall be deemed vacant. This precludes the governor, if Baxter had been governor, from declaring offices vacant unless expressly the General Assembly had by law authorized him to do so, and precludes him also from adjudging an office vacant.

An office created by the Constitution is beyond the reach of legislative abrogation and divestiture by any power except by the courts. It is property, and can no more be taken by proclamation of a governor than any other property of the citizen can be. Besides this, there is no one, I apprehend, who knows anything of the law upon the subject or has a reasonably intelligent appreciation of the right of any one to decline or refuse office who will maintain that the mere appointment to one office is a forfeiture of another. The acceptance of one office has been held in some cases good ground of forfeiture of another which when judicially ascertained would result in a vacancy of the office; but even this result could not be reached through the courts in Arkansas unless the Legislature had so declared it.

This reasoning, if sound, constrains to the conclusion that the so-called Legislature which issued the call for a convention on the 16th of May, 1874, had no quorum of lawfully elected members in either house, and therefore was not a lawful Legislature and had no legislative power; that the call for a convention was void, and the act authorizing the holding an election and the election of the delegates to the convention was void, and the delegates themselves had no right to meet in convention and no authority to frame a constitution, and the constitution promulgated by them was an absolute nullity. This legal view of the subject, conclusive in its utter condemnation of this pretended new constitution, finds no mitigation in the moral aspect, but on the contrary the whole proceeding bears the impress of hasty and partisan legislation, (two of the express evils which the law scrupulously guards against in the making of constitutions,) accomplished by fraud and violence unexampled in our previous history and scarcely paralleled in the recent unscrupulous and reckless efforts of the southern democracy to get possession of the State governments in the South.

Baxter was the regular nominee of the republican party for governor in the election of November, 1872. Brooks was the opposition candidate and was sustained by the democrats. Baxter was declared elected by means of fraudulent manipulation of the ballots, though in fact Brooks received a majority of nine thousand votes. Baxter, having by fraud secured the position of governor, determined to sustain himself in that position by whatever of fraud and force was necessary to that end. Knowing that Brooks had received a majority of the votes cast, and that upon an investigation by any tribunal appointed by law for such purpose he would be thrown out and Brooks put in as governor, his first efforts were directed to guard against a contest before the Legislature. By intimidation and other more oppressive means he succeeded in securing, first, that there should be no contest allowed for any seat in the Legislature, so as to retain his partisans who had gone into the State-house while in charge of military force under passes in that body, between whom and himself there was an understanding that no contest proposed by Brooks for the office of governor should be entertained. Some forty members of this Legislature were soon after appointed to lucrative offices by Baxter.

By the constitution of 1868 of Arkansas the appointing power of the governor, except when conferred on him by the Legislature, is very limited. Soon after this, Baxter appointed some five hundred persons to office in the State; so that this Legislature must have conferred on him the power to do so. This was evidently a part of the programme which subsequently developed itself—in the subversion of the republican constitution of 1868 and putting in its place the democratic constitution of 1874, the one recognizing and affirming the paramount allegiance of the citizen to the United States Government, and the other striking it out and leaving their organic law as it was in 1861 when its framers and their adherents declared that it meant State sovereignty and the right of secession. His petition for a contest being denied to Brooks in this matter of plain and unquestioned right in utter disregard of a decent respect for public opinion and the proprieties of official conduct, as well as of justice and law, his next step was to seek redress through the courts. Baxter determined that he would not submit to the authority of the courts. He had before this commenced coquetting with the democrats, and now he surrounded himself with an armed body-guard composed (to quote the language of a witness) "of reckless young men without any visible means of support, gamblers, unreconstructed men who have a bitter feeling toward all northern men, and to all law and order in fact," as he himself said, "I want men who will reist the officers of court, and the court itself if necessary." He further threatened to hang the judges of the supreme court, if upon "quo warranto" in a case pending before them they should issue a writ of ouster against him.

This is the conduct of the man in the high office to whose incumbent is intrusted by the people of Arkansas the duty of executing the law, upon whose fidelity all depended for security and protection, whose conscience was the keeper of the law, whose will could make it mighty for all of the beneficent purposes for which law is ordained; bound by the solemn oath he had taken, bound still stronger if possible by the duties of his exalted position, by the sacred trust confided to him, by regard for the opinions of the world, and by respect for virtue, truth, honor—by every principle and every emotion which could impel a good man to observe and enforce the law. Environed with all these bands constraining him to official duty, he openly, shamelessly, corruptly, for a price to be paid him by the democratic party, discards them all, breaks through and becomes himself the leader of a conspiracy to violate all law, to strike it down in the persons of its highest functionaries, the judges of the supreme court, and to overturn the constitution of the State itself; and with this and much more of "the same sort," in full view recognized and admitted by them, your majority committee tell you that all is quiet and peaceful in Arkansas now. Their recommendation reminds me of a dispatch during the Vicksburgh troubles from a zealous white-leaguer to his friend in Memphis:

Forty negroes killed to-day. All is lovely to-night.

The object sought by the democrats in Arkansas was in unison with a long premeditated and widely concerted scheme of the democratic party South, to get possession of the State governments in the South and to subvert the constitutions adopted in those States since the war, which are republican in spirit and loyal in enactment, by State constitutions framed upon the models which preceded these which were deeply imbued with the spirit of States' rights and whose enactments were in consonance with the political creed of the advocates of secession.

The constitution of 1874 left out, as I have stated, the declaration of the doctrine of paramount allegiance to the Federal Government which was in the constitution of 1868. In the State of Virginia it is proposed by the General Assembly to make a similar change in her constitution. In North Carolina the proposition for a convention is being pressed by the democracy, and in Alabama a joint committee of the senate and house have reported to the General Assembly in favor of a convention to change the constitution, and so will it be in each Southern State as the democracy acquire control; and if this action of the Arkansas democracy is ratified by Congress, this provision will be stricken from every Southern State constitution, and the only authoritative recognition and sanction by declared law in all the South of the highest and most vital result of the war—that of paramount allegiance to the Government of the United States—will be wiped out; and, so far as the States South are concerned, their fundamental law will place them just where they were in 1861, with the same party in power who at that time declared that the primary allegiance of the citizen was to the State, and not to the Government of the United States, who then went to war to maintain, and now manifest their continued adhesion to former beliefs by striking out and proposing to strike out from their State constitutions the (to them) offensive dogma of paramount allegiance to the United States.

The majority of the committee, with complacent credulity, a sort of easy-going indifference, which to say the least of it argues utter want of appreciation of the situation or the subject, say they think there was in most of the reconstruction constitutions rather "a surplusage" of professions of loyalty. This is a fling at the republican constitutions at the South generally and a fling at loyalty. If these gentlemen had lived at the South as I have done; had they passed through the long, protracted, and fiery political conflicts between a paramount Union and the right of a State to secede; had they seen how this doctrine of State sovereignty, under the favoring auspices of just such constitutions as the democracy are again re-enacting in the Southern States, had grown and spread until it diffused itself throughout the South and impressed upon the popular mind the conviction that primary allegiance was due to the State and not to the United States; did they know, as I have been taught by intercourse with and by political contact with them for twenty-five years, the earnestness and the depth of conviction which impels and inspires them in their purpose and their efforts to reassert this doctrine of State rights, the committee would have foregone the opportunity to fling at the work of the carpet-bagger, scalawag, and negro, rather than have ventured the suggestion that there was or had ever been a surplusage of loyalty in the constitutions or in anything else in the South. I congratulate them upon the discovery; and knowing them to be loyal men, I shall attribute their hit at these constitutions to the promptings of an æsthetic spirit rather than a deliberate purpose to disparage loyalty to the United States Government.

But without making an issue upon the question of taste, I take issue with the committee on the logic of the thing. To sustain this proposition I refer to the policy of our political adversaries upon this very subject. For more than a generation this doctrine of State rights was promulgated and advocated by its political apostles in the press, on the hustings, in legislative assembles, and in Congress, until it became the leading, controlling political idea of the democratic party of the South. It was urged with the zeal of political devotees by its believers, and it developed itself, as in the heat of extremes it must inevitably do, in a belief in the right of secession.

Now, had the constitution of the several Southern States contained a provision declaring that paramount allegiance was due to the United States, and that no State had a right to secede, the whole theory of secession would have vanished before it as darkness flees from the presence of the sun. We would have had no attempt to secede, no war, no half million lives sacrificed, no national debt, no people alienated by sectional political strifes, or embittered by the enmities of civil war. All these calamities would have been averted by the simple presence in State constitutions South of the expressions of loyalty which your committee characterize as surplusage. Had there been in the constitution of the State a plain ordinance declaring that paramount allegiance was due to the United States, no amount of argument, no matter how ingenious, could have induced the people to believe that primary allegiance was due to the State; and from the mere fact that the State constitutions South were silent grew that vast amount of opinion which precipitated the people into secession. With characteristic fidelity of thought and constancy of purpose the advocates of this doctrine are pressing back as near as is possible to the ante bellum status in the Southern States, while republican committees tell us that striking out this declaration of the most important political truth which evolved from the fiery collisions of civil war from State constitutions is a matter of such small concern as to awake no suspicion, arouse no reflection, command no comment, further than indirect approbation by criticisms upon the superfluous expressions of loyalty in southern republican constitutions.

I will say to the committee that expressions of loyalty like those they criticise were never ingrafted upon any other constitutions in the South except these republican constitutions, and if the report of the majority in this instance should be adopted by this Congress, they will never again be found in another constitution framed in the South. The party which the committee propose to confirm in power in Arkansas neither acknowledge the principle nor cherish the sentiment involved in such expressions of loyalty. On the contrary, they have a lively sympathy with the spirit that regards them as surplusage, and I doubt not have large admiration for the republican committee which has the nerve to embody it in a report to the House of Representatives. Reconstruction under their auspices is going on in Arkansas, but it is not republican reconstruction.

Whether Baxter was governor de facto after the judgment in the circuit court depends upon a somewhat vexed question. If the court had jurisdiction, which is sustained by a strong array of authorities, its judgment, until reversed, would conclude him, and Baxter would have no legal right to exercise the functions of governor; but whether he was acting as governor under color of legal right, or was a mere usurper, does not affect in his favor the darkest aspect of the subject under consideration. A conspiracy with political enemies to overturn the State government, prompted by the promise of personal advantage to himself, is so black a crime, that its enormity would not be diminished or increased by the legal or illegal tenure of the office he claimed, and which he used as the means of effecting his wicked and revolutionary ends.

In the Legislature which was elected in November, 1872, there was a majority of republicans, and after Baxter had entered into the conspiracy with the democrats to turn the State over to them, it was necessary to get rid of as many of these as practicable, and substitute them with others who would co-operate in the new movement. By wholesale appointments to office, and by the resignation of some five or six members after the adjournment of the Legislature, and when it would meet no more unless called together in extraordinary session by the governor, Baxter prepared the way for securing a Legislature composed of such materials as were needed to accomplish the fundamental change in the State government by setting aside the constitution of 1868 and adopting another, and at the same time with the adoption of the new constitution to elect democratic State officers, and thus make a complete transfer of authority to the democratic party by framing a constitution to suit their views and giving them possession of all offices in the State. Baxter issues his proclamation on the 18th of September, 1873, ordering special elections to be held on the 4th of November to fill forty-two (imputed) vacancies in the Legislature. In order to deceive the people, he stated that he did this only to conform to law, and issued a public notice that under no circumstances would he call the Legislature together; and as this was the common belief, the people, except such of them as understood the plans of Baxter, took but little interest in the election, and partisans of Baxter and co-conspirators with him were returned from nearly every county where an election had been held under the proclamation of the 18th of September, 1873.

On the 22d of April, 1874, Baxter, in violation of his promise and his public notice that under no circumstances would he do so, issued a call for an extraordinary session of the Legislature to convene on the 11th of May, and the body assembled in the midst of armed military authority, made their way to the house where they assembled through guards under passes from Baxter or his agents, and on the 13th, by the admission of the new members pretended to have been elected in November, 1873, declared itself organized, and on the 18th of May issued the call for a constitutional convention. This is the body assuming to be the General Assembly, and which is softly confessed to be such by the majority report in the following easy-going, gammon-like phraseology:

> One point made against the validity of this Legislature, or any act passed by it, is that as there was no quorum of old members in either house, they had no power to admit new members.

This is one point, only one of many, which can be made against this most vulnerable assembly; but it is one which goes to the substance of the thing, which, if true, takes from that assembly all prestige or power as a legislative body, and stamps as nullities all its pretended enactments.

The committee, in the brief and summary manner in which they put and dispose of this point, admit by plain implication its vital force and attempt to avoid it by such shallow casuistry as this:

> The constitution of Arkansas contained the usual provision, that "each house shall determine the rules of its proceedings, and judge of the qualifications, election, and return of its members," and as the record shows that a quorum was present in each house, and that the newly admitted members were certified to each house by the secretary of state, the committee regard all the questions made as to the validity of the election of the new members and the regularity of the organization as covered and concluded by the action of the Legislature itself.

It will be readily seen that the committee in their reply to this point beg the whole question. The point made is that this was not a General Assembly; that the house was not a house because there was no quorum, and the senate was not a senate for the same reason. The committee in effect admit this to be true, and they could not deny it. If they could they surely would have done so, for it would have afforded more solid ground both in reason and law for their conclusion than all else they have put forth in their report. It is clear they do not deny the fact because they cannot, but they bridge over the chasm by the proposition that they are concluded from inquiry into the fact by the records of this so-called General Assembly; in other words, that an assemblage of men meeting together and claiming to be the General Assembly of a State, without authority of law or the semblance of it, could preclude all inquiry into the legitimacy of their title or the validity of their action by the recitals of their own record. Had Baxter known that the thing could have been fixed thus easily, it would have saved him a great deal of trouble, probably some remorse, and shielded the people of Arkansas from much infliction and wrong.

The section of the constitution upon which the committee rely is:

> Each house shall determine the rules of its proceedings, and shall judge of the election, qualification, and return of its members.

This power is conferred upon each house. Each house has these powers and no other tribunal has or can constitutionally exercise them, but a quorum of members is necessary to constitute a house, and any less number of members than a quorum was not and could not be the house which the constitution invested with the power to determine the rules of its proceedings and judge of the election, &c., of its members. Less than a quorum had no power under the constitution except to adjourn from day to day and send for absent members. Nor had they any power to make any record except the record of these proceedings, and any other thing done by them not incidental or accessorial to this, or the record of it is absolutely void. These are delegated powers distinctly specifying to whom, "each house," the power was delegated, and can neither be extended nor diminished by construction or implication. The members in "each house" less than a quorum which met within Baxter's military lines on the 11th of May, 1874, did not send for absent members, but took it upon themselves to judge of the qualifications of persons claiming to be new members; and thus in plain violation of the constitution proceeded to organize as a General Assembly. This action being unconstitutional and therefore void, and going to the essential elements of its being as a General Assembly, dissipates all its pretension to legitimacy and makes void ab initio all its action.

This view it occurs to me is conclusive against the position of the majority report; but as the point to which the committee has called attention and has attempted to meet is conclusive, if sound, of this whole question of the legality of the call for a convention, I propose further to dissect the argument of the committee. They do not inform us whether their position rests upon or is intended by them to rest upon principles of law or logic or convenience. If they mean to imply that the legal principle which ordinarily prevails, that the record of tribunals established by law and authorized to keep a record of their proceedings is evidence of their proceedings, I answer that the principle has no application here, for the question before the house is not what the General Assembly did, but the question is, was the body whose records are referred to for its authentication the General Assembly of Arkansas? This principle, even when applied to courts of general jurisdiction whose records "import absolute verity," can never be invoked until it is admitted or established that it is a court. Whether it is a court is always open to inquiry and precedes the question of the validity of its records, for if not a court it can have no records, and any pretended records have no validity. So of each house of a General Assembly. It must be admitted or shown that it is a house within the meaning of the Constitution before it can claim that its action as such has any validity or that its records have any conclusive effect as evidence. It was not a General Assembly, because it had not in either house a quorum of members elected by the qualified voters at the time, manner, and place appointed by law.

The special election was a fraud gotten up as a part of the machinery in carrying forward the conspiracy between Baxter and the democrats to change the constitution and to turn the State over to the democracy. This plan, begun in prostitution of the law to fraudulent aims, was carried to its consummation by the most flagrant and reckless disregard of law, justice, or humanity. Martial law was proclaimed. The partisans of Baxter were enrolled in the State guard, as the military force was called, consisting of the most desperate men, commanded by still more desperate leaders, who quartered themselves upon the people, took possession of private houses and expelled the owners, levied contributions of supplies of food, arms, horses, and whatever else they chose, promiscuously; seized offices, arrested many persons upon trumped up charges and put them in jail, in many instances offering to release them if they would go for the constitution. Murdering, robbing, plundering, and imprisoning by these armed partisans of Baxter spread terror and consternation among the people, and when at its height the election for the call of the constitution came off, and of course it was adopted by an overwhelming majority.

This state of things, bad as it was, was supplemented by frauds in voting corresponding to the lawless outrages upon the persons and property of the people. The republicans as a party did not participate in the election, and most of them staid away from the polls. Those who did vote, it was conceded, voted generally against the call for a convention. The democrats voted for a convention. There were, according to the returns, 80,259 votes for convention and 8,609 against it. At the election upon ratifying the constitution the republicans resolved not to participate in it, and an address had been issued by the republican State convention declaring it improper and impolitic to nominate a ticket and advising republicans not to participate in the election.

The vote in the election was 103,504—78,694 for the constitution, and 24,807 against. The entire estimated vote of the State is 102,216. So that at an election in which the republicans had no ticket in the field, and from which the party had been advised by their State convention to refrain, there were counted over one thousand votes more than there were voters in the State. A witness examined by the committee stated that he had examined the average number of votes at elections to the voting population, and that the highest percentage in any election before this had 8.3 to 10, and the usual percentage was 7 and 7¼ to 10. At the average of 8.3 the vote on adopting the constitution would have been 85,809; at 7¼ to 10 it would have been 77,802, and at 7 to 10 it would have been 72,802. A short time after this there was an election for members to Congress, which was hotly contested, and the aggregate vote when both parties voted was from forty to forty-five thousand less than the vote at the election for the constitution. In the election for the constitution the election was under the control of the democrats. At the other there were Federal supervisors as well as the State officers superintending the election. This great disparity cannot be accounted for reasonably except upon the hypothesis that there were some thirty or forty thousand fraudulent votes cast or counted for the Constitution.

This constitution, red with the blood of the people, reeking with outrage and foul with fraud, we are asked to recognize and affirm as the free and fair expression of the will of the people of Arkansas. As between those who maintain that the constitution of 1868 is still in force and those who maintain that it has been substituted by the constitution of 1874, the burden of proof is on the latter. The constitution of 1868 must be held good "until it is shown that it has been altered and abolished and another substituted in its place by legal and peaceable proceedings adopted and pursued by the authorities and people of the State."

The principle announced in the extract I have quoted is sustained by both precedent and authority, and confirmed by reason so penetrating and pungent that no sound mind will dispute it. The proposed legal means of changing the constitution in Arkansas was by the Legislature submitting the call for a convention to the people at an election on the 30th of June, 1874, and by the convention submitting the constitution under regulations (laws) enacted by the convention to the people. To these imputed authorities the answer is, first, that the body assembled in May, 1874, upon the call of the governor, and, claiming to be such, was not the General Assembly of Arkansas.

I read from page 10 of the report of the majority of the committee:

> As to the effect of the existence of martial law, and that the Legislature met within Baxter's lines, the committee have to say that, although these circumstances cannot be considered as favorable to wise and careful legislation, still, as no attempt appears to prevent the attendance of members, or to control in any way their action by military force, they do not consider these facts sufficient to deprive the acts of that Legislature of the ordinary force of such action. The act for submitting the question of calling a constitutional convention was introduced on the 16th day of May, and was passed in both houses on the same day. In the senate the vote was 12 in the affirmative and 3 in the negative; the whole vote in the house was 50, but the majority was not shown.

The disingenuousness of this extract is so apparent that it sinks below the level of casuistry, and is scarcely entitled to the consideration which "specious pretenses" might claim. The committee admit that they do not think that the existence of martial law and the meeting of the Legislature within the military lines of Baxter could be considered as favorable to wise and careful legislation, but they imply that these were light circumstances, slight departures, not worthy of comment or rebuke; and as no attempt appears to prevent the attendance of members or to control in any way their action by military force, they do not consider these facts sufficient to deprive the acts of the Legislature of the ordinary force of such action; in other words, the committee could not see that it would help legislation to have a suspension of civil law, and proclaimed supremacy of martial law, with military forces around the halls where deliberated those who claimed to be the representatives of the people and the law-makers of the State of Arkansas. Nor do they see in it anything that could reasonably interfere with that freedom of debate and action which alone is consistent with the integrity of their representative character. Had the locality been changed, had scenes and surroundings such as these occurred in Vermont, her green mountains would have reverberated with the shouts of an alarmed and indignant people, and no one of her statesmen would have dared deprecate the just condemnation which would have been hurled upon the offenders.

Is liberty less endangered in Arkansas than in Vermont? Is the protection of law, the right to think and speak and act as freemen better guarded? If not, if on the contrary the law is trampled under foot; if beyond this the law is itself debauched and made the instrument of oppression; if tyranny, enthroned in the high places of the law, wrapped in its robes and invested with its prestige, commits every outrage and is guilty of every crime; if it advances from offenses against individuals to that highest crime the subversion by violence and fraud of the government itself, how is it that in Arkansas these things are condoned in the face of persistence in the wrong by the wrong-doers, when in other localities and States public opinion would have blasted their authors with the tempest of its fiery indignation?

How is it that men who regard order and reverence the law, who love justice and value freedom in their own homes and among their own people, can look with unruffled composure upon lawlessness and wrongs not exceeded, if equaled, during the late trouble—war in another State and at the suggestion of the wrong-doers themselves—and propose to ratify and confirm them in the possession and enjoyment of spoils wrung from an overawed and oppressed people? But this thin pretense put forth by them cannot avail the committee.

The reason why "there was no attempt to control the attendance of members was, that in the organization of the houses at the extraordinary session of the Legislature called by Baxter, in violation of his public announcement that under no circumstances would he call it, no members were allowed to enter the hall where the Legislature met except by permits or "passes" from him. The result was, that the Legislature was composed of members in complicity with him, "tools" ready to carry out his wicked designs, and hence there was no occasion for interference by Baxter's soldiers "to prevent their attendance or to control their action in any way by military force." Legislators and soldiers, they were co-conspirators, acting under the same commander, and leagued together with him to accomplish by fraud and force the same object—the overthrow of the government of the State.

The objection to the validity of the action of this Legislature, manufactured to order by Baxter and his new friends, the unrepentant rebel element of the democracy, is not that its members were not allowed to attend, or that their action was controlled by military force. This way of putting it is an egregious mistake or a sheer pretense. The objection to it is that it was not the General Assembly; that it was not composed of members created by the people in the manner and at the time and places appointed by law; and that its assumed authority was a usurpation and its acts absolutely void. We have seen how this objection was slurred over by the committee; and this addendum about attendance of members and interference, and the suggestion that its action should be deemed valid because there does not appear to have been any actual application of military force in constraining their legislation, has more of the impress of a fluttering to attract attention from the real objection to the Legislature than of argument.

This pretended abrogation of the constitution of Arkansas of 1868 and adoption of the constitution of 1874 was fatally and incurably defective in its initiatory movement, in not having any legal authority for calling a convention nor for ordering an election submitting the call for a convention to the people. The election and vote upon the vote for an election had no more legal force and no more effect to authorize the call of a convention than the voluntary meeting together of such of the people as chose to do and voting for a convention would have had. The subsequent proceedings, as the committee in effect admit, were without any authority of law.

The election upon the adoption of the constitution and for State officers was held under regulations or laws enacted by the convention itself, and were contrary to the constitution and laws of the State. The committee argue and establish, by authority and precedents which are unanswerable, that a convention called to frame a constitution has no powers to legislate and no powers to pass laws governing an election by the people upon the adoption or rejection of a constitution. The convention not only assumed to do this, but in doing so disregarded the manner of voting, (by ballot,) the boards of registration, the manner of appointing the judges and clerks of election prescribed by the constitution, and utterly set aside the machinery provided for by the constitution and laws for holding elections—took the whole matter into their own hands, that they might manipulate and control the election so as to have as many votes counted for the constitution as they chose. How successfully they managed this is evidenced by a declared vote for the convention, when republicans in large numbers did not vote, of some forty thousand votes more than were polled in the subsequent congressional election when both parties voted.

The pretended election for the constitution was held then without authority of law and in violation of the constitution, and was void. In other words it was no election, and the vote cast for the constitution or against it was a nullity, both in law and logic. Whatever of moral force it might have had, had its proceedings been peaceable and fair, is stripped from it by the perfidy which conceived and the violence and crime which accomplished it, and it stands in unrelieved enormity revolution effected by usurpation and tyranny, fraud, force, intimidation, and crime.

Election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

SPEECH OF HON. H. B. SMITH,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875.

On the joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution in respect of the election of President and Vice-President.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am quite conscious of the imperious necessity of shortening this debate. I shall therefore only suggest what seem to me points of importance, with no attempt at elaboration.

I move as a substitute for the joint resolution reported by the majority of the committee the following:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution in respect of the election of President and Vice-President.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution, to wit:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The President and Vice-President shall be elected by the direct vote of the people; but no voter in any State shall vote for candidates for President and Vice-President who are both citizens of the same State with himself. No person shall be a qualified elector of President or Vice-President who is not a male citizen of the United States and twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to provide for holding and conducting the elections of President and Vice-President. The returns of such elections shall be made to the Supreme Court of the United States within thirty days after the election. Said court shall, under such rules as may be prescribed by law, or by the court in the absence of law, determine any contest in respect of such returns, canvass the same, and declare, within ninety days after such election, by public proclamation, who is elected President and who is elected Vice-President.

SEC. 3. In counting the votes, the aggregate popular vote, in each State, for President and Vice-President, shall be respectively divided by the number of Representatives apportioned to such State in the House of Representatives, and twice the result, or quotient, shall be added to the vote of the candidate having the highest number of the popular vote in such State, for President and Vice-President respectively, as and for the State vote for such candidate. The person having the highest number of votes in all the States, including the popular vote and the State vote, for President, shall be President, and the person having the highest number of votes in all the States, including the popular vote and the State vote, for Vice-President, shall be Vice-President.

SEC. 4. No person who has been a justice of the Supreme Court shall be eligible to the office of President or Vice-President.

A word of explanation as to the third section.

I think in every State of the Union the electoral tickets comprise one elector from each congressional district with two "electors at large." The electoral college in each State is, by the Constitution, to be "a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress."

The two "electors at large" stand in place of the two Senators. They represent in the election of President the sovereignty of the State. They vote for the State. Of course the votes of the two electors at large are just equivalent to the votes of two of the district electors; that is, the State vote for President is the precise equivalent of the vote of two of the congressional districts.

This was one of the compromises of the Constitution. It has a sound, logical basis. It is right. If it was wrong, we cannot hope by the ratification of three-fourths of the States to mend it now.

The plan in the majority report, the Senate plan, is—

THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT PLAN.

This plan proposes to do away with the electoral colleges, for reasons elaborately presented in the reports of the committee of the Senate and the House, leaving the people to vote directly for President, but counting the vote of each electoral district as one vote, giving to the candidate having a majority of the electoral districts two electoral votes for the State vote for such candidate.

The plan proposed in the substitute which I have offered is—

THE CONSOLIDATION PLAN.

It proposes to do away not only with the electoral colleges but also with the unnecessary, useless, and dangerous machinery of the electoral districts, counting the consolidated vote of all the States. It nevertheless preserves to the States the same relative weight as now in the election of President, giving to each State, in the third section, a vote equivalent to the vote of two congressional districts, in place of the votes of the two electors at large under the present system, as and for the State vote, and providing that the majority of the popular vote of the State shall determine to which candidate the State vote shall be given.

The "electoral district-plan" originated with Mr. Benton, in an elaborate report made to the Senate in 1826. The underlying purpose was to elect the President by a popular vote, and at the same time preserve the representation, in the presidential election, of the slave population. Why adopt it now? Some of the objections to it are:

First. It disfranchises the minorities in the electoral districts. A minority of the popular vote might elect a President over a single opposing candidate receiving a majority of the popular vote. To illustrate, with the election in my own State in 1868: A majority of the popular vote was for Mr. Seymour, and he had the thirty-three electoral votes of the State. But at the same election eighteen districts elected republican representatives in Congress and thirteen democratic. Under the electoral-district plan, with a majority of the popular vote against him, General Grant would have received twenty and Mr. Seymour thirteen electoral votes.

Second. This plan would result in an unprecedented gerrymandering of the States by partisan majorities either of the State Legislatures or of Congress. This evil, even in the green tree, is the shame of our politics.

Third. It would concentrate the heat of a presidential contest and the enormous corruption funds of the great parties into a few close electoral districts. It would destroy public virtue and the purity of the ballot, and make such a district a political Louisiana.

Fourth. An inevitable result would be that the contests from the electoral districts would become so numerous that no possible tribunal could dispose of them between the election in November and the 4th of March.

There have been seventeen contested-election cases in the present House. The testimony in these cases has averaged probably more than five hundred printed pages. Some of them have involved as many as fifty polls.

In the next House there are twenty-two contested elections. As every member of the House knows, the labor of these cases is immense, more than any committee of this House has disposed of for many years in one session.

Now the best and most important feature of the proposed amendment is that which makes the supreme court the tribunal for deciding contests and canvassing the votes. In the present condition of the Calendar we ought not to impose a labor of such magnitude upon it if it were possible for the court to perform it in the time allowed, which it is not.

Fifth. Per contra: By counting the consolidated vote of all the States, on both sides, the bare numerical majority in a State is not a prize of such magnitude as to foster corruption and invite bribery, intimidation, and violence. No minorities would be thrown out in the count. We should have what we most need, moderation in our party contests, and the election would be by the people in reality as well as in name.

Sixth. The directness and simplicity of the consolidation plan is greatly in its favor. It is safer than any complicated machinery, which in politics, as well as in mechanics, is the more liable to get out of order.

Seventh. So far as I can see there is but one objection to it, that is, the qualifications of electors may vary in the several States. By enlarging its suffrage a State might gain a disproportionate advantage in a count of the consolidated vote over States with a more restricted suffrage. Thus, in ten States of the Union foreigners who have declared their intentions to become citizens are allowed to vote. To guard against any unfair advantage in this way the substitute provides:

No person shall be a qualified elector of President or Vice-President who is not a male citizen of the United States and twenty-one years of age.

It is not declared that all such shall vote, but simply that none other shall vote. With this provision the extension or restriction of suffrage may be safely left to the States.

If any State restricts the suffrage it will be at the cost of its relative weight in the presidential election.

This is no new restraint laid upon the States. By the second section of the fourteenth amendment if any restriction of the elective franchise be made in the States, it is done at the expense of the State representation in Congress. By far the most indispensable and valuable feature of the amendment, in my own judgment, is that which makes and the tribunal for determining election contests, and making the justices of the court ineligible to the offices of President and Vice-President.

This tribunal should be fixed in the organic law beyond the reach of partisan majorities in Congress.

The justices of the Supreme Court hold their office for life, that they may be thoroughly independent and beyond the reach of influence in their judicial action. They occupy a most exalted office. Let the Constitution write over the door of the Supreme Court for the eyes of ambitious men, "Who enters here leaves hope behind." You will then find in the recognized sanctity of that tribunal a palladium which will save the Republic in scenes of high party excitement and revolutionary turbulence, the approaching roar of which we can even now hear in the not distant future.

A wise foresight is the first element of statesmanship. I implore every member of this House to help put the ship in trim for the storm.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me point to a few of the EVILS AND DANGERS OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM, and but a few of them.

First. The presidential election is not free. A citizen cannot vote for the man of his choice unless a political party has put an electoral ticket for him in the field. Thus the caucus, that "direful spring of woes unnumbered," is imbedded in the Constitution. The people ought to have a free ballot.

Second. A minority of the aggregate popular vote often produces a majority of the electoral vote. Thus Mr. Lincoln in 1860, Mr. Buchanan in 1856, General Taylor in 1848, and Mr. Polk in 1844, were elected by a minority of the popular vote, having a majority of the electoral colleges.

Third. The minorities in the States are practically disfranchised. A majority of one in the popular vote of New York leaves two and a half millions of people with no voice in the electoral college.

Fourth. By the present system of electing by States and throwing out the minority vote, the electoral vote of a State is so great a prize as to foster corruption and violent partisanship, and to invite the dangers a wise policy would shun.

Fifth. The electoral votes of the States may be contested; for what has been, may be. There is no tribunal to decide such a contest; and under the Constitution as it is, there is a great deal of very distinguished authority for the startling proposition that there can be none.

No determination of such contests can be made by the States under existing laws, because the second article of the Federal Constitution authorizes Congress to fix the day on which the electoral colleges shall vote, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

This day was fixed by the act of 1792 as the first Wednesday of December. It is very plain that within the thirty days intervening between the election and the first Wednesday of December no adjudication is possible.

The certificates of the electoral colleges must be delivered to the President of the Senate sealed, and are not to be opened till they are opened in the presence of the two Houses of Congress on the second Wednesday of February. No contest can be tried and adjudicated after that by State or Federal tribunal, for, by the Constitution, the votes must "then be counted." Very clearly, too, on the first Wednesday of December the electors become functi officio, and the whole thing has passed beyond the reach of State authority. The difficulties in the way of a Federal tribunal are even greater.

Article 3 of the Constitution provides—

> Each State shall appoint in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal, &c.

The argument is that the Constitution has put the whole matter, without any reservation whatever, beyond the possible reach of Federal authority. Here is danger, simply appalling, and possibly very near.

Sixth. The twenty-second joint rule, under which the vote is now counted, is, in the almost unanimous opinion of public men, unconstitutional and void.

1. Because it attempts legislation in the guise of a joint rule.

Section 7, article 1, of the Constitution reads:

> Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him.

2. Because it gives to either House of Congress the power to reject the electoral vote of any State; whereas the weight of authority is with Chancellor Kent, that the President of the Senate is the sole canvassing officer of the electoral vote, and that the two Houses of Congress are present simply as witnesses, without power to interfere in the count.

Suppose, now, either House should rescind the twenty-second joint rule or treat it as unconstitutional and void, and the republican President of the Senate should improperly count for the republican candidate the fraudulent vote of a State which should decide the election and declare the result, and the House (having under the Constitution witnessed the proceeding) should by resolution immediately declare that such vote was fraudulent and that another candidate was elected; what then?

Again, if neither candidate have a majority of the electoral vote, the House immediately elects the President. No notice is to be given to the House of the want of a majority. The House is present by the Constitution to witness the count and take notice whether either candidate has a majority of the votes. Suppose the electoral vote of a State is included which the House honestly thinks is fraudulent and which is necessary to make a choice; and the House, in obedience to the Constitution, having witnessed the whole proceeding, immediately elects another President; what then?

Without narrating the scenes which have accompanied and followed the elections in the House of Representatives, of Jefferson in 1801 and of Adams in 1825, I quote from the report of Mr. Benton to the Senate in 1826:

> The committee believe that this failure has been complete, and that the principles which should govern the election of a Chief Magistrate in a free country require that the choice of President of the United States should no longer be permitted to devolve upon the House of Representatives.
> The dangers are—
> 1. Of corruption among the voters.
> 2. Of violence in the heat of the elections.
> 3. Of coalitions to elect or defeat a particular candidate.
> * * * * * * *
> Tried by the test of these axioms, the House of Representatives, as an electoral college stands condemned upon every one of them.
> 1. It is a small body; therefore capable of being corrupted.
> 2. It is a pre-existing body; and therefore capable of being tampered with.
> 3. It sits in the presence of the candidates; therefore is subject to be influenced by intercourse with them.
> 4. It votes in a body; therefore is subject to violence and capable of coalition.

The Senate bill for counting the electoral vote has been accepted by the Senate as a remedy in part for the defects of the present system, and prevented final action in the Senate upon the constitutional amendment, and its earlier consideration in the House. This is to me, since I have examined the Senate bill, a matter of profound regret. The relief it offers is, in my judgment, illusory and deceptive. The remedy proposed is utterly inadequate. Its passage would, in my judgment, be unfortunate, because it would lull the apprehensions of the country, now happily aroused to the dangers which threaten us.

This bill requires the concurrent vote of the two Houses to reject the vote of a State. The captious objection of one House cannot reject the vote of a State. But suppose the vote is fraudulent, the captious vote of one House will retain it; so what will you have gained?

Again, the gravest objection to the twenty-second joint rule is that the objection of one House will reject the return of the State vote. This bill provides that if there be two returns the objection of either House will reject both. This bill, if enacted into law, will invite double returns. Where the two Houses of Congress are politically opposed, one House will very likely vote to count one return and the other to count the other. An angry debate will follow. Party spirit will rise at once to fever heat; and will not one House or the other possibly refuse to reassemble in joint session to allow the declaration of a result based upon a vote which it honestly believes fraudulent and void?

I most deeply regret the introduction of this Senate bill, certain as it seems to me to prevent final action at this time upon the amendment of the Constitution; but, sir, whatever the result, I have endeavored to discharge my duty.

Gentlemen, we confront perils which are hard by. I implore you to study the situation. Action upon this subject is the one need of the Republic which cannot be put off. There is a time for all things. There is a time to save the Republic.

Cheap Transportation.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM B. SMALL,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the subject of cheap interstate commerce.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, has Congress power to regulate commerce by railroads among the several States? The Constitution provides—article 1, section 8, clause 3:

> Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The Constitution is to have a reasonable construction, according to the import of its terms, read in the light of the occasion, the necessity of its provision, the mischief felt, and the objects and the remedy in view. It is to have an equitable construction, sometimes restraining and sometimes enlarging the letter of its provisions, so as more effectually to meet the end in view and prevent a failure of the remedy.

Bacon says such a construction ought to be put upon a statute as may best answer the intention of the makers. And Blackstone says such intention is to be gathered from the words, the context, the subject-matter, and the reason and spirit of the law.

In construing so important an instrument as the Constitution of the United States, and especially those parts of it upon which the commercial prosperity of the country largely depends, we are not to indulge in vague speculations which may lead us far astray, nor are we to view it so narrowly that we may exclude from sight the great objects of its enactment; but we are to remember that its authors were engaged in the grave business of framing a constitution for a great and growing people, a constitution not only suited to the then existing state of affairs, but one that, extending into the far future, should be susceptible of expansion with the country's growth and be adapted to the ever-multiplying exigencies of a free people; one that, when the nation's increasing millions should have occupied every rood of her territory, developed every mine, utilized every waterfall—when her commerce, rolling along her great highways, busying itself upon all her lakes, rivers, and bays, and pushing its course across every sea, should bring her into close relations with every nation and tribe of men, should be found ample to embrace within its protecting folds all of the country's great national interests.

The nature and objects of the Constitution, its scope and design, are therefore to be kept constantly in mind in construing its provisions.

In its examination, says Judge Story, the antecedent situation of the country and its institutions; the existence and operation of the State governments; the powers and operation of the confederation; and all the circumstances which had a tendency to produce or obstruct its formation and ratification, deserve a careful consideration.

In conferring powers upon Congress, the Constitution does not undertake to give us exact definitions of them; but it proceeds by way of enumeration, stating briefly one after another in general language the powers it confers.

In the instance under consideration the power granted is simply stated, without limitation or explanation.

The subject-matter of this power is the regulating of commerce. What does the word "commerce" as used in the Constitution embrace? If it is to be limited to traffic, buying and selling and exchanging commodities, then a general and unrestricted term, applicable to many things, is to be limited in its construction to one of its significations only. As used in the Constitution, commerce not only signifies traffic, but also navigation, trade, intercourse, transportation, and everything employed in commercial operations as well.

Says Chief Justice Marshall, in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1:

> Commerce is not only traffic, but it is commercial intercourse. It describes commercial intercourse in all its branches beween nations and parts of nations. It includes navigation. All America has so uniformly understood it. A power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if the word "navigation" had been added to the word "commerce." These words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. There is no sort of trade between this country and any other to which the power does not extend. Commerce, as used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term.

Therefore every constituent of commerce is necessarily a part of this unit, whether it be the goods themselves, their sale or exchange, transportation, navigation compensation, the agents, the means employed, or the various operations in use. They are all constituents of commerce, parts of this unit, within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore subject to congressional regulation.

In the same case of Gibbons vs. Ogden Mr. Justice Miller says:

> Commerce, in its simplest signification, means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various mediums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce. The subject, the article, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation. Ship-building, the carrying trade, and the education of seamen are such vital agents of commercial prosperity, that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not have the power to regulate commerce.

In the Passenger cases, 7 Howard, 416, the court say:

> Commerce consists in selling the superfluity, in purchasing articles of necessity, as well productions as manufactures; in buying from one nation and selling to another; or in transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the profit.

In Reading Railroad vs. Pennsylvania, 15 Wallace, 237, (case of the State freight tax,) Mr. Justice Strong says:

> Beyond all question the transportation of freight or of the subject of commerce for the purpose of exchange is a constituent of commerce itself.

Judge Story in his commentaries upon the Constitution, section 1057, 1058, adopts and enforces the doctrine of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and says:

> If commerce does not include navigation, the Government of the Union has no direct power over the subject, and can make no law prescribing what shall constitute American vessels, or requiring that they shall be navigated by American seamen; yet this power has been exercised from the commencement of the Government, with the consent of all America. The power over navigation and commercial intercourse was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their Government, and it is impossible that the convention should not have understood the word commerce as embracing it.

The convention was laboring to cure the defects of the old confederation, under which each State retained its independence and all its rights of sovereignty not expressly delegated to the United States; and the only restriction therein upon the States in regard to commerce was that each State should concede to the citizens of other States the same privileges of trade and commerce as should be enjoyed by its own. The present provision is found in all the draughts brought before the convention for a constitution precisely as it now stands, except that at near the close of the convention the words "and with the Indian tribes" were added.

Nearly all of the old thirteen States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution had independent and conflicting laws for the regulation of commerce; and the history of the times plainly shows that a leading motive for the adoption of the Constitution was to relieve commerce from the embarrassment and ruinous consequences resulting from the conflicting legislation and jurisdiction of so many different States and to place it under the regulating control of one uniform law. So entirely was this understood, that all of those State statutes dropped out of use, lifeless, by the force of the Constitution alone at its adoption without any act repealing them.

It is plain, therefore, that if you exclude navigation and commercial intercourse from the intent and meaning of the word commerce as used in the Constitution, you will stamp upon that instrument the prominent defect of the Articles of Confederation, and you will subject the Union to the conflicting discords of rival States.

But give to the word commerce, as used in the Constitution, the interpretation which it has been shown our highest judicial tribunal and the most eminent law-writers have given it, and you make the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it what the Constitution declares they shall be—the supreme law of the land. You will rescue commerce from the dangers of impending conflict; you will bring it within the control of one uniform system; you will make it what the Constitution intended it should be, a unit; and henceforth, in the forcible language of Mr. Webster—

> Its character will be described by the flag which waves over it—E pluribus unum.

Such being the interpretation of the word commerce in this clause of the Constitution, it must have the same by implication throughout the clause, whether it relate to foreign commerce or commerce among the several States; and so it has been uniformly held. Judge Redfield (Redfield on Railways, 719, 720) says:

> It will be perceived that the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States must be precisely the same, because it is given in the same clause of the Constitution and in precisely the same language.

Judge Marshall says:

> The genius and character of the whole Government seems to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally. * * * Among the States means a commerce that concerns more States than one.

The power of regulating commerce is not limited to the modes of transportation and the forms of commerce in vogue when the Constitution was adopted. It was so decided in Gibbons vs. Ogden, in the very infancy of steam navigation.

This power comprehends, as was held in Gilman vs. Philadelphia, 3 Wallace, 713, the control, to the necessary extent, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a State other than that in which they lie. And this phrase "navigable waters" is not now, as formerly, restricted to those waters where the tide ebbs and flows; but it extends to all waters in lakes or rivers which are in fact navigable for boats of ten tons burden and upward, and which communicate by navigation with the sea, or with two or more States. (1 Redfield, 724.) Nor is it limited to commerce by means of water transportation, but it applies to commerce by land as well. The great natural division of commerce has for ages been into foreign and inland. Wherever there is commerce with foreign nations or among the States, the power applies; and it can make no difference whether that commerce be upon rivers passing through different States, or upon the land, passing through them, nor what is the kind of vehicle used in the transportation. The sole question is, Is it commerce among the several States?

Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Company, 17 Law Register, (January, 1868,) says:

> Navigation is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce as well as when carried on by water, and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other.

In the Reading Railroad case against Pennsylvania, before mentioned, which was the case of a State tax upon freight brought into and carried out of or through the State upon the railroad, the court hold that the transportation of freight as the subject of commerce upon the railroad is a constituent of commerce itself, and therefore subject to congressional regulation; that wherever the subjects in regard to which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they are exclusively within the regulating control of Congress; that transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State or from one State to another is of this nature; that a tax by a State upon freight taken up within the State or carried out of it, or taken up without a State and carried into it, is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

In this case Mr. Justice Strong says:

> It makes no difference whether this interchange of merchandise from the seller to the buyer is by land or water. In either case the freighting of goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce. The prescribing a rule for the transporter by which he is to be controlled in bringing the subjects of commerce into a State and taking them out again is a regulating of commerce.

And Mr. Justice Miller, in Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge, says:

For myself I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of our immense traffic on any railroad which has voluntarily become a part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation justify or require it.

This opinion of Judge Miller is warmly approved by Mr. Justice Dillon, of the circuit court, and by Judge Redfield in his valuable work on Railways.

If Congress has not the power to regulate interstate commerce by railroads, then no power exists anywhere to regulate it; and the result is that we have a class of corporations, upon which the welfare of almost the entire internal commerce of the Republic largely depends, which are superior in this matter to the republic itself; for every State of this Union, having as to every other State exclusive jurisdiction within its limits, including everything to which the functions of government appertain, it follows that one State cannot confer powers upon a corporation created by itself to be exercised in any other State; neither can it control or regulate beyond the boundaries of its own jurisdiction corporations created by another State. It necessarily results, therefore, that lines of railroad passing through more than one State are not a unit, but separate corporations in the several States, being domestic corporations in the State creating them and foreign corporations in the other States, and their capacity to act in one State may be terminated by legislative or judicial proceedings while their capacity to act in another State remains in full force.

Judge Redfield, in his work on Railways, (page 723,) says:

Those who assume to argue, that Congress has no power to regulate traffic upon those extended lines of railway reaching from one end of the Union to the other must, if they would meet the question fairly, either say that the traffic on these extended lines is not commerce at all or that it is not subject to any regulation or control whatever; for it is certain the States have not the power to regulate, to any purpose or with any efficiency, this interstate railway traffic. It must then come under control of Congress or be left to its own devices and impulses—an experiment never yet tried in any other country.

If this power is not conferred upon Congress, then each State has the power to make such regulations as its estimate of its own interest, the importance of its own products, and the advantages or disadvantages of its own locality may dictate; either stopping this commerce at its boundaries or enticing it into and restraining it within its territory, to establish or foster one great trade center, regardless of the welfare of all the other States.

This power so granted to Congress is exclusive. The very nature of the case requires that it should be so. It is the commerce of the United States that is to be regulated. It has sometimes been said that the States have a concurrent power which they may exercise in the absence of any law of Congress. But what kind of concurrent powers are those which cannot exist together? The grant of power is complete and unlimited. It is granted to the Congress of the United States to regulate commerce among the several States—to prescribe the rule, establish the system, and exercise the control, the sovereign authority over the subject.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, says:

This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution. * * * The power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its own constitution the same restrictions upon the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

Judge Story says, (Commentaries on the Constitution, section 1063:)

It has been settled, upon the most solemn deliberation, that the power is exclusive in the Government of the United States. The power to regulate commerce is general and unlimited in its terms. The full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power and leaves no residuum.

Chancellor Kent (1 Commentaries, 436) says the word "regulate" implies full power over the thing to be regulated, and excludes the action of all others who would perform the same operation upon the same thing.

Chief Justice Richardson, of New Hampshire, in commenting upon this clause in the case of Scott vs. Wilson, 3 New Hampshire Reports, 326, says:

This clause of the Constitution of the United States seems to us so clearly to give to Congress the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the States that, until the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide otherwise, we shall be disposed to consider that as its true meaning.

Although States cannot impair the obligations of contracts, and although an accepted charter is a contract, yet railroads are subject to general laws in the same particular as individuals are, and when entirely within a State, may be regulated by it. Railroads are public highways. States have exercised the high prerogative of eminent domain in authorizing them to take lands for their roads, which could not be done for private purposes. They are common carriers of persons and goods. They are engaged in a public employment, and have taken upon themselves public duties, and are therefore under public control, as far as it is necessary for the public welfare. Their use may be defined and their rates of transportation limited, as it has been settled in Alcott vs. The Supervisors, 16 Wallace, 678; Charleston Railroad vs. Chappell, 1 Rice's (S. C.) Reports, 398; Railroad vs. Davis, 2 Devereux & Battle's (N. C.) Reports, 469; Vedder vs. Fellows, 20 New York Reports, and in several other States.

It seems no longer open to doubt that Congress may regulate interstate commerce over railroads by prescribing the rates of transportation, if need be, or that States may do the same as to their purely internal commerce.

The principle of this proposed exercise of sovereignty is as old as the foundations of the common law, and it constitutes an element in the government of every civilized community. It is the principle of the protection of the people against extortion.

Laws limit the toll of the miller, the rate of interest of the money-lender, the rates of common carriers, of hackmen and of ferriage, and sometimes the compensation of innkeepers, of lawyers, physicians, and pension attorneys, and they also prescribe the weight of the baker's loaf, and the number of hours that shall constitute a day's work. In one word, this law, in the exercise of its salutary control over the avarice of man, says that in the absence of contract, or when one of the parties is not in a situation to make contract, compensation shall in all cases be reasonable.

The method to be adopted to regulate interstate commerce lies wholly with Congress, and they may descend to the most minute particulars in prescribing the rules which shall govern the transportation of passengers or merchandise. (See Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 586.)

This power as to interstate commerce has slept in undisturbed silence until the country, marching onward with majestic strides, in population, wealth, and productions, has outgrown the old channels of trade, and necessity now demands that this power should be called into action; and it is a sound proposition that in all countries laws should arise out of the character and situation of a people, that they should grow with its progress, be adapted to its peculiarities, and be incorporated into its habits.

The following statistics of the growth and productive capacity of this American empire of industry almost stagger belief; and they serve to indicate the mighty interests that center in the great problem of the present time—cheap transportation; a problem that can be solved only through the power of the General Government; for experience has demonstrated the truth of the aphorism that competition is not possible when combination is possible.

The average charges for transportation of wheat per bushel by rail in 1872 was—

From Chicago to Philadelphia and Baltimore ..... 30¾ cents.
From Chicago to New York ..... 32½ cents.
From Chicago to Boston ..... 38¾ cents.

In 1872 we had about sixty-seven thousand miles of railroad (more than half the railroad mileage of the world) with an aggregate capital of $3,159,423,057, about equal to the wealth of the nation in 1840; and their gross earnings were $473,241,055, being $150,000,000 more than the entire revenues of the Government during the same year; and the estimated values moved by these roads during the year was over $10,000,000,000. On the 30th of June, 1873, the entire shipping of the United States, including steamboats, barges, and canal-boats, had a tonnage of 4,696,027 tons; and of these there were employed in domestic commerce upon our northern lakes and western rivers seven thousand and sixty-eight vessels, having a tonnage of 1,444,404 tons.

In 1872 there were transported from the western to the Atlantic States 162,908,813 bushels of grain, and of this 109,338,803 bushels were transported by railroads.

These statistics show that our internal commerce is many times greater than our trade with all foreign countries; that the surplus of our cereals and food supplies furnishes more than one-fourth of the entire exports of the country annually; that this great surplus has mainly to pass over long lines of interstate railways, over which the producers have no control nor any will in fixing the rates of transportation; that the ten States north of the Ohio furnish 59 per cent. of the entire cereal product of the United States, and a surplus for exportation, over their own necessities, of 400,000,000 bushels, or 10,000,000 tons, annually; and the Atlantic and Gulf States require of the Northwest 75,000,000 bushels of wheat annually to supply their deficiencies.

In 1871 our agricultural population was 5,922,471, and its agricultural wealth was $11,124,958,707, an average of $1,878 per head. This wealth pays in wages annually, including board, $310,286,275, and yields an annual product of $2,147,538,658, a net income of $2,137,258,383, or $360 per head. Every million, therefore, added to our agricultural population adds about $1,878,000 to the nation's wealth. The increase of our agricultural population, including immigrants, is now about 80,000 annually, and we shall have ample room for centuries yet.

European populations are crowded. For 110,000,000 in 1776, they have 307,000,000 now. But our farms embrace less than one-fourth of the area of our States and Territories. We have untold millions of acres of productive land still awaiting the first magic touch of the husbandman.

Our country must early be the granary and food producer of the world.

In 1868 the United Kingdom and Hungary each produced 4.01 bushels, and all Europe combined produced 4.09 bushels of wheat per head, which at the assumed necessity of six bushels per head shows an appalling deficiency; while we in 1870, at the same ratio, produced a surplus for exportation of 55,288,028. But add to this our immense product of Indian corn, of which England alone took in 1870 34,000,000 bushels, and of which Europe raises comparatively little, and our advantage over Europe in cereal food supply is apparent.

These statistics indicate in some degree the immense importance of our domestic commerce to the growth and prosperity of the country and to the world, and yet no officer of the Government has been charged even with the duty of collecting statistics concerning it; and to-day the producing and domestic commercial interests of the country lie at the mercy of gigantic railroad corporations, over which the Government exercises no control, and which rates of transportation are fixed by one rule only, namely, the highest rate that the business will bear.

The average winter rates, when navigation is closed, is 44.4 per cent. higher than in summer, when the canal is open. The pressure of traffic in October and November taxes the canal above its capacity, and rail rates go up at once to winter prices.

It is an established axiom that the cost of movement diminishes in proportion to the increase of tonnage; and yet, with the great increase of tonnage on our great western railways, rates have but slightly diminished.

The duty of these railroads to the public demands that they should rely upon a large business at low rates, and experience shows that they may safely do so.

Mr. Gladstone never uttered a profounder truth than when he said:

A financial experience long and wide has convinced me that, as a rule, the state, individual, or company thrives best which dives the deepest down into the masses of the community, and adapts its arrangements to the wants of the greatest number.

His experience with English railways strikingly demonstrates the truth of his statement. The history of railroading in Belgium and in this country gives the same results where the experiment has been tried.

Competition is no remedy for high rates. After the first scramble for territorial dominion is over combination succeeds to competition, competing points drop out, low rates disappear, a monopoly of the business is secured, but no responsibility to the public is recognized.

By the corrupt watering of stock and the capitalization of surplus earnings these gigantic railroads have created vast amounts of nominal railway capital, represented by fictitious stocks, by which the public are robbed and gamblers enriched. The report of the Senate committee shows that these three lines of railroad, namely: the Erie from New York to Dunkirk, the New York Central to Chicago, and the Pennsylvania line to Chicago, have an excess of capital over the cost of their roads of $195,000,000, for which the commerce of the East and the West must be annually taxed $19,000,000 to pay a 10 per cent. dividend; and yet these roads are independent of legal control.

Say the Senate committee:

There are four men, representing the great trunk lines from Chicago to New York, who possess and exercise without apology or explanation powers which the Congress of the United States would not dare to exercise except in the face of the most urgent necessity. An additional charge of 5 cents a bushel for transportation of cereals would have been equivalent to a tax of $45,000,000 on the crop of 1873.

In the clear light of existing evidence, is the proposition to be for a moment entertained that Congress shall not exercise its power to interfere and rescue our great highways of commerce from such an unlimited and unscrupulous control by compelling the common carrier to deliver the products of the land to market for a reasonable compensation?

Granted that there may be difficulties in the way; but is it to be said that the present railroad officials are the only human beings upon whom Divine Providence has bestowed sufficient intelligence to enable them to fix rates for transportation that shall be reasonable? Out of our forty millions of people cannot such a board of commissioners as the pending bill contemplates be selected as competent as existing railroad officials? The pending bill is equitable and reasonable. The rates fixed by the commissioners are to be deemed prima facie reasonable, allowing the dependent roads to prove, if they can, that their charge in the given case was not unreasonable. But when all has been done that can be judiciously done toward regulating the rates of railway transportation other means will be demanded to facilitate and cheapen the movement of our immense products. It has been suggested to that end that the Government should construct and operate a great national freight railway.

The objections to this scheme are very grave. To accomplish the desired end there must be a system of railways involving in their construction untold millions of dollars. It would be embarking in a business not properly appertaining to the functions of government, but invading the domain of private enterprise. The advantages to be gained would be too slight to warrant such an undertaking.

A wiser statesmanship points to the improvement of our water-ways and leaving the transportation thereon free to competition, reserving only a reasonable toll therefor, as the great means upon which the country must ultimately rely to secure the cheap transportation of our immense and rapidly increasing products. Experience abundantly demonstrates that this is the only method by which the expense of transportation of heavy goods can be reduced to its minimum. Happily the topography of the country in a great degree favors this method. When proper examinations and surveys shall be made, every section of the country will be found to possess advantages in this regard which may be turned to profitable account.

For New England and New York the proposed Caughnawaga Canal, from the village of that name, eight miles above Montreal, to Saint John's, on the Richelieu River, above Lake Champlain, presents striking advantages. It would be but twenty-nine miles in length, and its estimated expense, with a capacity sufficient for lake vessels of one thousand tons, is $2,000,000. This would give an entire water-route from the great lakes to Lake Champlain; and a ship-canal from Whitehall, on Lake Champlain, to Fort Edward, on the Hudson, would continue the water communication to New York.

The Senate committee estimate that by this water-way the cost of transportation of grain and corn from the ports on Lakes Superior and Michigan to the ports of New England on Lake Champlain could not exceed 12 cents per bushel, and that the cost of distribution from these latter points by rail to the consumers in New England would not exceed 10 cents a bushel. The supplies could be brought to Champlain during open navigation, and stored for winter use. New England receives about 40,000,000 bushels of grain annually from the West, and nearly all by rail, at an average cost of about 27 cents per bushel for transportation. The proposed water transportation, therefore, is estimated to make a saving on the expense of transporting to New England alone of nearly $6,000,000 annually.

Let capitalists turn their attention to the great necessity of improved means of water transportation. Let Congress in due time, when the whole matter shall have been fully considered, and when it will not be too burdensome, provide for such improvement in our water-ways as the public good demands and as the then existing state of affairs will render expedient; and let Congress also prescribe such regulations for interstate commerce as a due regard to the best interests and prosperity of the country require. We shall then see a beginning of some uniformity in our home commercial law, without which the Federal Constitution puts in what constituted the great motive for its creation; and then our citizens, while sending their merchandise all the entire length and breadth of the Republic, will be subject to but one code of commercial law. One rule, framed in the spirit of the Constitution, in the principles of uniform justice, in the light of experimental wisdom, will govern the whole and regulate by its national application a commerce greater than Europe has ever known—a commerce which is to-day controlled by the despotism of remorseless monopolies.

Mr. Speaker, we have a common country, bound together by the ties of a common brotherhood and a united interest. The citizen of the East, as he travels westward, westward, still westward, and beholds with admiring wonder almost boundless fields of corn and grain, cultivated by their owners themselves, and dotted with comfortable homes, villages, and cities which have sprung up in a day, and beyond them still wider expanses of grassy prairies, stocked with innumerable herds of thriving cattle, and beyond them still untold millions of acres of productive land, hitherto untouched by the hand of civilization, and realizes that this is all his own country, the common heritage of the American people, he can but be filled with awe and reverence for the Great Being through whose bounteous goodness this has all been received. And while his heart glows with patriotic pride at the majestic proportions, the unequaled progress, and the destiny of his country, he can but feel the strength of that common interest and the warmth of that common fellowship which should bind together all the citizens of the Republic.

And the dweller of the far West, as he leaves his prairie home and travels eastward over the battle-fields which the blood of the heroes of a common country have consecrated to liberty, and pauses at the smoking furnaces seething with the molten metal from which are constructed the rails over which his produce is transported; or travels through the great cities, jostling with the ever-moving tide of business, and views the mighty edifices which colossal fortunes have reared, and sees the harbors crowded with great ships which have come from all quarters of the globe; or stands beneath the shadow of lofty monuments which a common patriotism has erected and dedicated; or waits below the great water-falls and listens to the hum of the machinery which they propel, and sees the outpouring of the products of manufacturing industry, he may well exclaim with pride, "This is my country, the heritage of my people."

Let the North and the South, the East and the West, laying aside local prejudices, and, recognizing the mutual interests and reciprocal obligations which bind together all portions of our common country, combine to make it what nature designed it should be, the model and leading nation of the globe. Then we should learn how infinitely greater are the triumphs of peace than those of war.

Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

SPEECH OF HON. JOSEPH H. RAINEY,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the bill (S. No. 1349) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with some degree of reluctance that I take the floor at this time for the purpose of opposing the bill now under consideration. I am not indifferent to the fact that it was framed with the best of objects in view by the Committee on Banking and Currency; but, on the other hand, I am confident that it will fail, signally fail, of its intent and purpose unless amended so as to secure better protection to the vast interests it is intended to control. I meet with an insurmountable objection at the very threshold of its consideration. Take, for example, the second section, which provides for the appointment of one commissioner only instead of three as now authorized by the act of June 20, 1874. It reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to appoint one commissioner, who shall execute a bond to the United States, with good sureties, in the penal sum of $100,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties as commissioner aforesaid, and take an oath to faithfully perform his duties as such, which bond shall be executed in the presence of said Secretary and approved by him and by him safely kept; and when said bond shall have been executed, and oath taken, then said commissioner shall be invested with the legal title to all the property of said company for the purposes of this act, and the said act of June 20, 1874, and shall have all the rights, prerogatives, and privileges, and perform all the duties, that were conferred and enjoined upon the three commissioners mentioned in said act of June 20, 1874.

Upon this commissioner will devolve the responsibilities and duties heretofore conferred upon the three commissioners. He will be required to furnish a bond in the amount of $100,000, with plenary powers to control to the best of his ability the vast assets of the Freedman's Bank, nominally estimated at something over $2,600,000. The committee have apparently lost sight of this important point, that there is no telling what may occur to deprive the bank of the valuable services of this commissioner for weeks or months during his continuation in office. In the interim of such an event his duties would have to be discharged by some irresponsible subordinate or subordinates, who will be in nowise directly liable for any losses that may be sustained or errors that may be committed; the result of which would be to the detriment of the depositors. If the number now provided for by law be retained in office—and I favor their retention—the responsibilities would be divided in such a manner as to give a hopeful indication to the unfortunate depositors that their interests would be guarded more safely and with additional vigilance. The trouble heretofore has been, sir, that the operations of this institution have been kept too much of a secret from the public, who are entitled, at least through its report, to a truthful statement of its affairs. Let us not fall into a similar mistake at this time. Section 3 reads thus:

That said commissioner shall have the right and authority to compound and compromise debts due to and liabilities of the company, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

This section confers a power heretofore not delegated in any of the enactments regarding this bank. The placing of discretionary power of this character into the hands of any one individual is in my judgment fraught with danger that cannot be avoided, although the action of said individual may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. Why, sir, the honorable Secretary has as much and more than he can find time sufficient to faithfully execute now. The consequence is that some of the most important work of the Treasury Department is done by subordinates without the supervision of the Secretary, notwithstanding it is made or supposed to be his duty to know. Although he may be willing to aid in the adjustment of the affairs of this corporation, yet it is obvious to my mind that when he shall have appointed a commissioner, as provided for in this bill, he will naturally feel that his duty has been virtually discharged or conferred upon another. Then, sir, will begin "the one-man power," who will "have the right and authority," according to section 4, "to sell any of the property of said company at public or private sale, as in his judgment he may deem best, and to buy in for the benefit of the company any property which may be offered for sale to pay debts and liabilities to said company, if in his judgment said property is being sacrificed by said sale. He shall make to the purchasers of property sold by him deeds of conveyance to their respective purchases."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I dissent in toto from the provisions of this section.

This is a carte blanche that will have the sanction of law in the event of this bill passing that ought not to be permitted in the manner provided. In language that cannot be mistaken, it is a bid and temptation for speculation in the assets of this institution that would be hazardous if not totally destructive of the very interests intended to be protected.

There has already been too much of the freedman's hard-earned money that has found its way to this city only to be entangled in the meshes of worthless securities, if not fraudulent ones. For instance, according to the report of the commissioners, over $1,440,446.86 have been loaned on real estate by the principal office, on which there have been paid $231,589.71, leaving a balance due of $1,208,857.15. Thus you will perceive that through the transactions of the parent bank alone there is about 50 per cent. due the depositors of the entire estimated value of its assets. Now, if you were to add insurance, accrued interest, advertising, &c., we will have $103,381.87 more, making a grand total of $1,312,239.02 still due. Several of these loans were made on real estate previous to the amendment of the charter in May 1870, consequently without the shadow of legal authority, which of itself was a gross imposition on the depositors and violative of the confidence which had been reposed in the officials.

It is really surprising what little attention was given on the part of Congress to the amendment passed May 6, 1870, to the charter of 1865, which is in the following words:

Be it enacted, &c., That the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company," approved March 3, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto at the end thereof the words following: And to the extent of one-half in bonds or notes, secured by mortgage on real estate in double the value of the loan; and the corporation is also authorized to hold and improve the real estate now owned by it in the city of Washington, to wit, the west half of lot No. 3, all of lots 4, 5, 6, 7, and the south half of lot No. 8, in square No. 221, as laid out and recorded in the original plats or plan of said city: Provided, That said corporation shall not use the principal of any deposits made with it for the purpose of such improvement. (16 Statutes at Large, 119.)

There was no discussion or explanation whatever given to the House by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which had the matter in charge, for the necessity of this amendment and its important bearing on the interests of the bank. And yet it is plain that the troubles and difficulties by which this institution has been beset had their beginning in the anticipated amendment to its original charter of 1865, which provides as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the general business and object of the corporation hereby created shall be to receive on deposit such sums of money as may be from time to time offered therefor by or on behalf of persons heretofore held in slavery in the United States, or their descendants, and investing the same in the stocks, bonds, Treasury notes, or other securities of the United States. (15 Statutes at Large, 511.)

If this provision had been kept inviolate, these sharpers and tricksters would not have been able to fleece this poor, needy class of people forming a majority of the depositors out of their small stipend which they had managed to save.

A large majority of the depositors knew nothing of this amendment, believing all the time that the investments of their money were based on Government securities. If the reverse had been dreamed of I have no hesitation in saying, for I believe it, there would have been a falling off of deposits to the amount of from 25 to 50 per cent. of the estimated amount. The poor colored people hoarded up their earnings in this bank, believing positively that the General Government would be responsible for what deposits they may have made, and further, that it was under its supervision to a certain extent. And so it was, inasmuch as the Government has the power to send an examiner to any bank to which it may have given a charter, so as to protect if possible, by a careful examination, the interests of those who relied implicitly upon it. So it could and should have done in this case.

Who could have supposed that the principal office would have been permitted, under the very eye of the Government, to have transacted business in such a reckless and extravagant way with the funds of those whom the Government at that time recognized as its wards? But the business has been done, and done quickly, to the loss of the destitute depositors.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, it appears as though there was a determination to deceive the inexperienced and credulous, for they even advertised that the bank was perfectly safe, (its safety being guaranteed by the United States.) This led many to deposit that otherwise would never have opened an account with the bank. I am satisfied that such was the belief in my State, and I am sure it was in others.

On 16th March, 1874, the parent bank was due to the branch bank Charleston, South Carolina, $231,210.35; Macon, Georgia, branch, April 10, 1874, $42,812.32; Savannah, March 24, 1874, $133,100.49; Augusta,

April 3, 1874, $89,632.19; Wilmington, North Carolina, March 13, 1874, $33,087.51; Mobile, Alabama, April 25, 1874, $61,143.37. Thus it will be seen that the branch banks at Charleston, South Carolina; Macon, Savannah, and Augusta, Georgia; Wilmington, North Carolina, and Mobile, Alabama, were not allowed to make loans, but forwarded their deposits to the parent bank monthly if not oftener, who assumed the exclusive right to lend their money on such questionable securities as the following:

$2,500 loaned on $3,000 Northern Pacific Railroad bonds.
$2,600 loaned on 480 shares Young Men's Christian Association stock.
$5,500 loaned on 125 shares International Steamship and Supply Company.
$1,400 loaned on 100 shares Morris Mining Company, Colorado.
$2,000 loaned on $4,000 first mortgage Maryland Mining and Manufacturing Company.
$12,000 loaned on $20,000 second mortgage Maryland Mining and Manufacturing Company.
$3,500 loaned on $4,000 Detroit Car Loan Company.
$4,750 loaned on 20 shares American Steel Lock Company, and 20 shares Capital Publishing Company.
$3,025 loaned on $10,000 7 per cent. Florida bonds.
$9,000 loaned on acceptance of James Magruder, board of public works.
$1,117.53 loaned to Noah Dillard, order on board of public works.
$1,002.23 due by R. I. Fleming, no collateral.
$160,088.38 due from J. V. W. Vanderberg, for which the following securities are deposited as collaterals: $3,000, Second National Bank stock; $69,000, District of Columbia 8 per cent. certificates; $2,760, interest on 8 per cent. certificates; $27,836.40, auditor's certificates; $27,000, auditor's certificates; $9,193.33, paving and curb-stone tax; $1,425.90, bills against the old corporation of Washington; $1,808.63, claims filed for auditor's certificates, lost; $10,983, acceptance board of public works.

Mark you, these are supposed to be the most available of them all.

Take the figures as presented by the commissioners' report, and it is conclusive that when the principal bank failed or suspended operations it was indebted to the six banks alone referred to above $590,986.23, if not 25 per cent. more than that amount. In other words, it was indebted in smaller sums to the poor laboring men, women, and orphan children in each of those States a quota of this immense amount.

It must not be lost sight of that at the time these sums were forwarded to the principal bank at Washington the depositors in the Southern States invariably believed that the moneys so deposited by them were subject to their order, as per rules and regulations governing the branch bank, and if sent to the parent bank it was for the purpose of being guarded with greater security or invested to better advantage. But, alas! they were deceived.

The suffering to which the poor creditors have been subjected is heart-rending in the extreme. Both their aged and their young have been deprived of the ordinary necessaries of life; their sick could not be cared for, nor their dead decently interred by them nor by benevolent societies, because all their gathered funds had been swallowed up in this gulf of destruction.

Parents and guardians could not send their children or wards to school, because they had not the means to buy them comfortable clothing. Truly the distress has been alarming—starvation and destitution being threatened on every hand, and in many instances their little homesteads sold from over their heads.

But, Mr. Speaker, a word as to the remedy. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] having charge of this bill, in his remarks when it was under consideration the other day, said—

That there is a great deal of opposition to putting the power of winding up this concern into the hands of one man, although he may be under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The object of the committee in coming to that conclusion was that this institution, which has been so miserably managed, shall be saved all unnecessary future expense, and therefore we have reported in favor of one commissioner at a salary of $5,000, rather than three commissioners with salaries aggregating $9,000.

I agree with the gentleman in part, but I cannot indorse all that he has said; for it does not appear to me that the proposed method will, or can possibly be, a saving to the depositors, as it is likely that one man will take longer to wind up the concern than three naturally would. Again, if authorized to act alone, he would require additional clerical assistance, that would doubtless consume in salary the $4,000 that is proposed to be saved, if not more. The committee in their report said: "In most insolvent estates much depends upon the dispatch with which they are wound up." Yet they recommend but one commissioner to expedite this important business.

Now for the remedy. My proposition, sir, is that the Government take control of the entire assets of the bank, hold the same until the securities which have been subjected to shrinkage shall again be restored to their market value. In the mean time advance the depositors 30 per cent. of their deposits, holding the assets as security and for future indemnification to itself. This will materially benefit the impoverished depositors and relieve their immediate necessities. But I do not know that there is any law or precedent to warrant the Government in assuming this liability; nevertheless it would be a gracious and magnanimous act if accepted and carried out. Failing in this, let the three commissioners be continued, with instructions to pay over to each branch that shall be reorganized under a charter granted by their respective States whatever dividend they may be able in the course of time to declare, if so requested by a majority of the depositors respectively located. When this is not desirable, let them pay to each depositor as provided for by section 6 of the present bill, which is in the following language:

That whenever said commissioner is prepared to make a dividend to the depositors, he is authorized and directed, through the United States Treasurer, to place in the various depository banks of the United States which are convenient to said depositors an amount sufficient to pay them; and the officers of said banks shall pay the depositors, or their assignees, and take receipts from them in such way and manner as shall be prescribed by said commissioner and the Secretary of the Treasury; and said evidences of payment shall be returned by said officers to the commissioner, and by him preserved: Provided, That where there are no depository banks of the United States, then said commissioner may, with the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, pay the depositors in said localities in such way as he may deem best.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the numerous technicalities which make it difficult to adjust the affairs of this bank in a satisfactory manner, and yet, on the other hand, I am desirous of having some legislation that will in some measure restore confidence and relieve the pressing wants of my defrauded constituency, and the entire depositors in the Freedman's Trust and Savings Bank.

Surely some legislation should be inaugurated that will encourage the poor to save their earnings for useful purposes, and thus be saved from beggary and penury. Sir, this subject is not unworthy of the attention of statesmen, inasmuch as it will benefit a considerable number of our citizens, and ultimately contribute toward the wealth of the whole country and the happiness of its inhabitants.

We have already legislated too much in the interest of the opulent, and neglected too sadly the interest of the poor.

Election of President and Vice-President.

SPEECH OF HON. H. H. HARRISON,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the manner of the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I think there has been no question before this House during the Forty-third Congress more important than the amendments to the Constitution concerning the election of President and Vice-President. The joint resolution proposing these amendments, reported by the Committee on Elections, and the adoption of which that committee has recommended, if ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States of the Union will, I admit, bring about a radical change in the mode of electing President and Vice-President. The fact that it will result in a radical change, however, ought not on that account alone to be held as an argument against the proposed amendments.

We have tried the present system for between eighty and ninety years. Its excellences and its defects have become apparent in the light of a long experience and observation of its practical workings. If it has met the expectations of its friends and has been shown to be the best system or plan which could have been adopted, it certainly ought not to be changed. If on the other hand it has been shown to be unwise and unfair, or the machinery connected with it useless or dangerous, it ought to be changed if a better system can be substituted for it. That it has not met the expectations of those who inaugurated it is clear, for the electoral-college feature of it was never carried out in consonance with the theory which the framers of the Constitution held as to its practical working. That theory was that select bodies of men selected by the different States, or as the Legislatures thereof might direct, distinguished for their ability and wisdom, and uninfluenced by popular passion, should be left free to exercise their judgment in selecting a President and Vice-President. They were to meet in their respective States and vote by ballot, and the provision that they should vote by ballot was in the direction of securing their complete independence in making the selection.

The manner of the appointment of the electors was left exclusively to the Legislatures of the different States. The State Legislatures might appoint the electors or provide for their selection otherwise, and I find nothing in the existing provisions of the Constitution or in the debates in the convention of 1787 which warrants the belief that the framers of the Constitution supposed that the electors would eventually be selected by a popular vote. In fact, the theory was that the electors were to be independent of pledges to vote for any particular person, so that when they met to cast their ballots they could deliberate with freedom and act for the best interests of the Republic, untrammeled by pledges and uninfluenced by popular clamor, prejudice, or excitement. This theory, as is well known, has not been carried out in practice, for the electors have been nominated by conventions of political parties, have accepted the nomination and been voted for upon an implied pledge that they would cast their ballots for particular persons for President and Vice-President. These implied pledges custom and public opinion have made binding, and there has been no instance of a violation of the undertaking of the elector to vote so as to carry out the wishes of those who selected him for the purpose.

While, however, it is fortunate that the theory of the independence of the electors in the matter of voting, unrestricted and uninfluenced by pledges, has not been carried out in practice, this pledge in advance defeats one of the main objects, if not the main object, to secure which the plan of an electoral college was adopted, for in practice the electors are converted into agents to carry out instructions given them before their selection. Besides failing to meet the expectations of those who advocated the adoption of the present plan, I submit that the wisdom of the system has not been vindicated or shown after a fair trial of its workings. The plan of electing a Chief Magistrate charged with the exercise of the supremely important and delicate duties of that high office, or a Vice-President, who in certain contingencies would become President, in any way that might defeat the will of the people of the United States, was not wise, because it was inconsistent with the great leading principle upon which our whole theory of government rests.

The debate and the proceedings of the convention which framed the Constitution show that the delegates in that convention were of the opinion that the people could not be safely trusted with the selection of President and Vice-President. The convention eventually adopted as the safer experiment the plan of interposing between the people and the selection of President and Vice-President a select body or select bodies of men deemed better capable of making the selection intelligently and safely; but before the convention adopted this plan of electoral colleges, several other plans were proposed, discussed, and voted upon.

On the question of an election by the people instead of by the national Legislature, the proposition received the vote of only one State—that of Pennsylvania.

The proposition that the Executive should be chosen by electors appointed by the State Legislatures was voted down, and that of choosing the Executive by the national Legislature was at first unanimously adopted, but the vote was afterward reconsidered and the convention decided—

First. That the national Executive should be appointed by electors.

Second. That the electors should be chosen by the State Legislatures.

Afterward it was voted (seven States voting in the affirmative and three in the negative) that the President should be appointed by Congress.

Subsequently, upon taking up the report of the committee of eleven, in which was presented the draught of a plan for appointing electors by each State, and for electing and counting the votes for candidates for President and Vice-President, (which plan embraced a provision for an election by the Senate, in case there should be more than one candidate having the votes of a majority of the electors, or in case none of them have a majority,) seven of the States voted to retain this last-named provision in the plan, and three voted against it and in favor of an election, in either of the contingencies mentioned, by the Congress instead of by the Senate.

Finally, the clause in the report providing for the appointment of electors by each State was adopted by the convention—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia voting in the affirmative, and North and South Carolina in the negative—and the existing provision for an eventual election by the House of Representatives was adopted by a vote of seven States in the affirmative and three in the negative.

The question as to the mode of selecting the Executive, according to the admissions of the ablest members of the convention, was an exceedingly perplexing and difficult one.

It is evident that the plan at last adopted by the convention was based upon distrust of the people, and had its origin in aristocratic forms of government in which the nobility or select bodies elected the sovereign or chief magistrate.

The convention dreaded the effects of popular passion and prejudice and tumult in the important matter of the selection of a Chief Magistrate, if the people assembled at the polls should vote directly for their choice for President, and assumed that small bodies were less easily corrupted than large ones.

It is not surprising that the framers of the Constitution, who had not seen the theory of a democratic government in this country tested, and who were surrounded by peculiar circumstances in the performance of their work of inaugurating the experiment of providing for the organization of the Government and the distribution of its powers, should hesitate to provide for electing the Executive by a direct popular vote. Mr. Madison and Mr. Gouverneur Morris preferred this plan to an election by the national Legislature; but the electoral system, as provided for, was a compromise between those who favored an election by Congress and those who opposed that mode of selecting the Chief Magistrate of the nation.

There would seem to be as little danger resulting from passion, excitement, and tumult if the people voted directly for President and Vice-President, now that the original theory of the electoral colleges acting independently of pledges to vote for particular persons has been exploded, as there is when the people vote for electors for President and Vice-President. This objection, originally urged against the plan of electing the President and Vice-President directly by the people, lost all of its force when the people, conforming to this inconsistent plan of having a selection of their President and Vice-President made for them and independently of them, eventually adopted the plan of instructing the electors selected by them as to who the latter should vote for. The people have slowly, but surely and effectually, resumed, so far as they could under the existing provisions of the Constitution on the subject, the power and control over the matter of the selection of their Chief Magistrate and the Vice-President, of which a want of full confidence in the theory of popular government on the part of the delegates in the convention of 1787 sought to deprive them.

In the early presidential elections the electors were chosen in many States by the Legislatures without the question of the selection of the electers being voted on by the people; and this was done by Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, New York, and Vermont down to the year 1824, and by South Carolina down to the late war; but now, in every State in the Union, the electors are chosen by the people, and are practically pledged in advance to carry into effect the will of the people in the particular State in which they are voted for in the selection of President and Vice-President.

Nor has the other objection urged against the election of President and Vice President by a direct vote of the people, that the electoral colleges would be less likely to be corrupted or improperly influenced than the people, been shown to have any weight in it; for it would seem to be clear that small bodies of men intrusted with such a vast power as that of selecting a President of the United States, with such immense patronage as flows from him, may be reached by the arts of corruption and intrigue, while the great body of the people cannot be so easily reached, if they could be corrupted at all. The patronage at the disposal of the President is sufficient, if it could have the effect, to corrupt every presidential elector; but it could not reach the whole body of the American people.

I have alluded to the two objections urged against an election directly by the people, and have suggested what I regard as a full answer to these objections. I have also referred to the fact that the original theory upon which the electoral-college system was adopted has not been carried out in practice, and that the people had shown a determination to control the action of the electoral colleges, so that now the electors in every State in the Union are voted for and instructed by the people at the polls.

I come now to speak further of the objections to the existing plan of election of President and Vice-President.

It deprives the people of the privilege of voting for their choice for President and Vice-President, and is not in harmony with the American theory announced by Mr. Madison, that "it is indispensable that the mass of citizens should not be without a voice in making the laws which they are to obey, and in choosing the magistrates who are to administer them."

Ours being a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, each voter, entitled to have his voice heard in the selection of the highest as well as the lowest elective officer in the country, should be permitted to vote directly for the men of his choice for President and Vice-President. But under the electoral-college system a very large number of voters have been deprived of the privilege of voting for their choice for President and Vice-President, and are thus practically disfranchised.

In 1860, in most of the States in the southern section of the country, electors who were pledged to vote for Mr. Bell, Mr. Breckinridge, and Douglas were nominated and voted for, but no voter in that large section could have his vote for Mr. Lincoln counted, however anxious he may have been to vote for him, because no convention or party had nominated electors on the republican ticket. And such was the case with persons desiring to vote for Mr. Douglas in States where no Douglas ticket had been nominated.

The present system makes the convention or caucus system indispensable, for the individual voter cannot give effect to his vote unless there are others in the particular State or locality who will meet and nominate an electoral ticket for which he can vote.

The election of a President and Vice-President, under the present system, is practically an election by the States. Under the present apportionment, the electoral votes of ten or less than one-third of the States may decide the result.

A candidate voted for for President may carry enough States to give him a majority of the electoral votes by an aggregate majority not exceeding 50,000 votes of the popular vote, thus securing his election, while his competitor may carry all the remaining States by majorities amounting in the aggregate to half a million majority of the popular vote over the successful candidate.

The vote of each State being cast or counted solidly, it is the same in effect as if the people of the States, giving in the aggregate a majority of the electoral votes, had voted unanimously for the same man, which is never the case.

There is a state of things existing in this country at present very different from that which existed in it when the mode of electing a President and Vice-President was discussed in the convention of 1787. Then the population of the whole country was little more than the present population of some of the States of the Union. Then there was danger that in case of an election by the people, as the people would be likely to vote for some man in their own State, that the largest State would be sure to succeed, except in the case of the slave States, the slaves having no suffrage.

But with a population of forty millions of people, and the objection to a direct vote by the people, so far as it formerly affected the then slave States, removed, we may now, aided by an experience of eighty-seven years, look at the question divested of this objection to an election of a President and Vice-President by a direct vote of the people.

There is an inherent injustice and unfairness in the present plan.

It had its origin in the idea of preserving the equality of the States in the selection of a Chief Magistrate and of protecting the smaller States in their rights. But how has the plan worked in this regard? A familiar and forcible illustration of the truth of the proposition that, instead of preserving and securing an equality of influence among the States, so far as the smaller States are concerned, the elections may be controlled by some one of the larger States, is found in the case of the election for President in 1844, when the small vote of five thousand given in New York to Mr. Birney resulted in giving the whole electoral vote of that State to Mr. Polk, and elected him over Mr. Clay.

It would seem that there was an intrinsic injustice in requiring the vote of a State to be cast solidly, as it must be under the existing provisions of the Constitution. In New York, for instance, one person voted for for President may have a majority of only a few votes over another person voted for, which small vote carries with it the entire electoral vote of the State, and this small majority in effect silences the voice and suppresses the wishes of nearly half the qualified voters of that State.

It is evident that the power of the States, as such, in controlling the election of President which they now possess, is secured to them in the practical working of the present system, by the electors being pledged in advance to vote for a particular person, and by the vote being cast in solido. And it is also evident that the influence of the States in the presidential elections, thus secured and exercised, is secured at the expense of a principle of fair representation.

While the doctrine of State sovereignty has generally been insisted upon as a protection to the smaller States, this particular feature of it has been preserved and strengthened at the expense of the smaller States. The electors were at first generally chosen by districts, in States that did not choose them by their Legislatures; but this practice was broken up by two of the larger States of the Union, because it tended to destroy their power in the presidential elections. The votes of these States being cast as a unit, or solidly, they were of greater consideration or weight in determining the result than under a system which might divide them up among the contending candidates.

The result in New York and Pennsylvania, for instance, is looked to with the greatest anxiety, as likely to determine the election, because the electoral vote of these States amounts to more than one-fifth of the whole electoral vote to be cast for President, and may control the result; whereas, if the votes of these States could be divided up, and counted upon the plan in the amendment we are now considering, the case would be quite different.

I have presented facts and considerations going to show the unfairness of the present system or plan of electing a President and Vice-President, its injustice, and the objections to the present mode, growing out of the fact the provision for the appointment of electors, and the incidents of the electoral system, may defeat the popular will.

I now come to consider a defect in the present plan of electing a President and Vice-President which may result in the most serious consequences if the defect is not soon remedied.

There is no tribunal by which, or law under which, contests growing out of these elections can be decided.

The Constitution provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress." Thus the mode of choosing the electors is placed entirely beyond the power and jurisdiction of the National Government; and whatever disorders, irregularities, or failures in the appointment or selection of electors in any of the States may occur, they are entirely without remedy or redress by the Government.

All of the States now, by the enactment of their Legislatures, provide that the electors shall be chosen at large by the qualified voters of the State, but in none of them is there any provision of law for the settlement of any contest that may arise out of such election. We are not justified in supposing that the presidential elections in the future will be free from fraud, or that the will of the people may not be defeated by violence, disorder, or fraud at the polls, or in the action of supervising and returning boards.

To say the least of this matter, it is evidently the part of wisdom and sound statesmanship to guard against such a possible, if not a probable contingency in a matter threatening so much of danger to the peace if not to the existence of the Union.

In every State in the Union there is a provision for settling contests in the elections for governor and other State officers, but no provision is made for contesting the election of electors; and the returns, it is claimed, must stand and be counted in the presence of the Senate and House, if sent forward in the time and in the manner directed in the Constitution.

Besides the omission to provide for settling contests, if any, in the election of electors in the States, it is claimed that there is no provision under which the two Houses of Congress can make any determination of any question which may arise upon opening the certificates and counting the votes.

The Constitution provides that the President of the Senate shall be the depositary of the electoral votes, and that he "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted."

Under this provision it is claimed that the two Houses of Congress are mere witnesses of the counting of the votes, and that they are to be present in their separate characters, and not as a joint convention possessing any power to do more than to simply witness the counting of the votes.

It seems to have been understood that neither House, in its separate character, or both as a joint convention, could do more than be present and witness the performance of a duty enjoined by the Constitution on the President of the Senate, and the counting of the votes; and this seems also never to have been questioned until the year 1857, when objection was made to the counting of the vote of Wisconsin, because the electors in that State had failed to meet and cast their votes on the day prescribed by law. The objection had much weight in it, for the Constitution provides that the electors shall meet and vote on the same day in all the States, and Congress had provided, a few years after the Constitution was formed, (in 1792,) that the electors should meet in each State and cast their votes on the first Wednesday in December, and that they should be chosen within thirty-four days of that time.

The President of the Senate, however, decided that the objection was not in order, and that nothing was in order but to receive and count the votes. The vote was counted, and Mr. Buchanan was declared elected. A motion was made to correct the count and exclude the vote of Wisconsin, which the President of the Senate decided was out of order, and after the count he declared the meeting dissolved.

Upon the retirement of the Senate debates ensued on the question in both Houses, and these debates show that the better opinion was that the two Houses had no jurisdiction over the matter of counting the electoral votes, either jointly or separately, as the Constitution had failed to provide such jurisdiction as to any question which might arise on the occasion of counting the vote, and that the two Houses were to be present simply as witnesses of the accuracy and result of the count.

It happened that the vote of Wisconsin was not decisive of the result. But suppose it had been, and by counting it for Frémont and Dayton they would have been elected, or by rejecting it Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Breckinridge would have been elected, Mr. Mason, the President of the Senate, having the decision of the question in his own hands, what would have been the result? How dangerous the exercise of such a power as that vested in such a case in the President of the Senate! Is it too much to assume that the danger of civil war or revolution would have been imminent?

Nor would the danger have been less imminent if the objection made to the counting of the vote of Wisconsin had been entertained and allowed, and the decision of it referred to the concurrent action of the two Houses, taken separately, as now provided by what is known as the twenty-second joint rule, adopted in 1865. The Senate was then strongly democratic and the House republican. The two Houses would most likely have failed to agree, and we can imagine the serious and dangerous complications which might have resulted, and to what extent the peace of the country might have been endangered.

If the two Houses are to be present on the occasion of counting the votes merely as witnesses, and the President of the Senate has power to open the certificates and prevent the action, or any action, by the convention of the two Houses, and upon the announcement of the vote by tellers declare the result, the power is a dangerous one to be lodged in any one man, attached, as he may be to the fortunes of a political party or personally interested in the result of his own decision.

And the latter hypothesis is not a mere theoretical or fanciful speculation as to a simply possible contingency. It has occurred six times in the history of presidential elections that the President of the Senate has been directly and personally interested in the result he announced. Mr. Adams, in 1797, declared himself elected President. Mr. Jefferson in 1801, when he and Colonel Burr were candidates for President, announced the result. Vice-President Tompkins opened the certificates and the vote was counted when he was a candidate for re-election. In 1837 Vice-President Van Buren did the same thing and declared himself elected President. In 1841 Richard M. Johnson announced the vote for himself and that for Mr. Tyler, the opposing candidate; and in 1861 Mr. Breckinridge, then President of the Senate, announced the result when he himself was a candidate for the Presidency.

It was the duty of these distingnished men to do just what they did, a duty enjoined on them by the express provision of the Constitution, but the danger of continuing that provision which vests the power given the President of the Senate in any one man, and particularly when he may have a personal interest in the result of his action, or be influenced by the demands of his party upon him, is not lessened by the fact that such men as Adams and Jefferson, Tompkins, Van Buren, Johnson, and Breckinridge may have acted with perfect fairness in the transaction.

It will be noticed by those who take occasion to examine the very interesting debate which took place in February, 1857, when it was moved to reject the vote of Wisconsin, that protests were vigorously made against the action of the President of the Senate on that occasion, and the proposition that the two Houses were simply present under the Constitution as mere witnesses of the counting of the vote was earnestly combated.

The question was not settled, and could not very well have been settled.

But even if the theory contended for on that occasion by those who assumed that the two Houses had a right to act on the question made as to the vote of Wisconsin, and either receive or reject the vote, was adopted as the true one, the difficulties and dangers growing out of the question by reason of the fact that the Constitution fails to provide how questions of the kind arising when the vote for President and Vice-President is counted still remain.

If the President of the Senate in such a case has the power which it is claimed by some he possesses, there is danger. If the two Houses present at the opening of the certificates and counting of the vote have jurisdiction to determine any question which may arise affecting the vote of any State, there is danger; and with the doubt existing as to whether the power to decide these questions resides in the two Houses, or can be determined by the two Houses acting in convention, or by their acting separately, and also as to how they shall act, whether by States or by a different method, there is danger; and it must be apparent that when the action of the President of the Senate or of the two Houses is had in any case where that action decides the result of a presidential election, while the doubt we have mentioned exists, the worst possible consequences are likely to follow.

It will not remove this danger to say that the framers of the Constitution never intended that the President of the Senate should ever exercise any judicial power in determining or ruling upon the vote as between two sets of electors, or upon the sufficiency or validity of the certificates, or the votes of the electors in any State; for we have seen, in practice, that the exercise of these high powers may devolve upon that officer ex necessitate rei, and that his decision, although it may decide the result in a doubtful case, is final unless the twenty-second joint rule remedies the omission or defect in the Constitution.

The action of the two Houses under this rule in a doubtful case or on a doubtful question, particularly when party spirit was bitter or party excitement high, would not give satisfaction to the country, or be regarded as a final settlement of the result, especially as it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find a warrant in the Constitution for the power assumed by Congress to adopt this rule, which virtually makes Congress the judge of the result of the election for President and Vice-President. Even admitting, for the sake of argument, that Congress had the power to adopt the rule, it is both unreasonable and dangerous, because it may make the right of the people of a State to participate in a presidential election to depend upon the concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress in the manner as directed in the rule. It will be noticed that the provision of this rule is not that the vote shall be counted unless the two Houses concur in its rejection, but it is provided by the rule that "no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses."

The presumptions of law are in favor of the fairness and legality of the vote offered to be counted; and yet, with these presumptions, Congress has undertaken, by this twenty-second joint rule, to say that if objected to the vote shall not be counted unless both Houses vote to receive it. Under this rule, the objection to the vote being counted is virtually assumed to be valid and conclusive unless overcome affirmatively by the vote of both Houses, thus placing it in the power of one House to reject the vote of a State. The rule invites captious objections to the votes offered to be counted, and places it in the power of a defeated political party having a majority in either House to defeat an election by the people. It is a powerful temptation, which a defeated party may not resist. If objection to the vote of a State is made, and the Houses disagree, the vote of the State is lost. This may result in a tie vote or in the election of a candidate who, if the vote thus rejected was counted, would be defeated, or in preventing either of the candidates from having a majority of the votes, and thus throwing the election into the House of Representatives.

It must be apparent that the claim supported by the twenty-second joint rule, that Congress has power to admit or reject the electoral vote of the States, subverts the whole theory upon which the existing constitutional provision in relation to the appointment of electors is based; and it is equally plain that if Congress had this power, its exercise would conflict directly with the known purpose of the framers of the Constitution to preserve the independence of the executive and the legislative department each of the other. When the electors meet on the first Wednesday in December, their office is fully performed, and there is no authority given in the Constitution or in any law under which the college could ever again meet for any purpose. No tribunal has been provided to inquire into the rightfulness or regularity of the selection of electors, and set aside their votes, nor did the framers of the Constitution anticipate the possibility of a contest between two sets of electors, or of irregularities or frauds in the choice of electors, which would warrant the rejection of their votes.

But by requiring that the electors should meet in each State on the same day, and make a list of the persons voted for for President and Vice-President, which they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of Government, directed to the President of the Senate, the framers of the Constitution evidently intended that no tribunal should inquire into the rightfulness or regularity of their election and set aside their votes; and there was not only no opportunity for a contest as to their election or as to the action of the electors in casting their votes, but it was made impossible that Congress should pass upon these questions, as the electoral colleges in each State, when they had cast their votes on a particular day, on that day became functus officio, and the votes then cast, sealed, and sent to the President of the Senate were not to be opened except in the presence of the two Houses, and were to be counted on the occasion of their being opened.

If this provision of the Constitution is complied with according to the letter of the provision, there could be no contest in relation to the vote; and it must be counted if it appear that the vote was cast as required by the Constitution, and certified in due form as required by law, and this without regard to notorious frauds in the selection of electors.

From what has been said, it is easy to perceive that with no provision for a tribunal to decide contests in relation to the election of President and Vice-President, and the possible if not the probable assumption by the two Houses of Congress of the right to decide questions which may arise on the occasion of counting the electoral votes, especially under the twenty-second joint rule, the danger of having the election thrown into the House of Representatives is largely enhanced. That this result is to be deprecated, and if possible prevented by the adoption of a different mode of determining the question of who is elected President and Vice-President, we take it for granted will be conceded. Certainly it will be conceded by all who desire that the voice of the people shall be heard on the important question of the selection of the chief executive officer of the nation, and of one who may succeed to that high office.

Under the provision of the Constitution for an election by the House of Representatives, the representation from each State is entitled to only one vote without regard to the vast difference in population of the different States as compared with each other, and it must be without regard to the principle upon which all our ideas of popular representation in this country are based.

In the next place, such an election, particularly in cases where it may be regarded as defeating the popular will, is fraught with danger to the peace of the country. The elections in 1801 and 1825 need only be mentioned as suggestive arguments in support of the proposition that an election by the House of Representatives may be a dangerous proceeding. The throwing of the election into the House furnishes great opportunities for bargain, intrigue, and corruption.

No one, it is assumed, would desire to see a repetition of the action of the House in 1825, when the candidate defeated in the House had received a large proportional majority of the popular vote, and had received a large plurality of the electoral votes.

A repetition thereof, under certain conditions of public sentiment, and with party excitement at fever-heat, might lead to the most deplorable results.

Moreover, when it is considered that one of the objects in having an election for President every four years is that the public sentiment of the country may be expressed in the selection of a Chief Magistrate who is to represent that sentiment and carry it into effect so far as he can constitutionally, it is manifestly wrong that members of the House elected nearly two years before the election of a President, and whose political sentiments and policy may have been repudiated by the people in the presidential election, should elect the President, and thus defeat the more recently expressed popular will.

To remedy the evils, omissions, and injustice, and to guard as far as possible against the dangerous tendencies and incidents of the present mode of electing a President and Vice-President and determining the result, the committee have recommended the adoption of the amendments now reported back to the House.

This proposition, as I have said, involves a radical change in the mode of election, and dispenses entirely with what we have sought to show was the useless machinery of presidential electors and electoral colleges.

First. The amendments proposed secure the election of President and Vice-President by a direct vote of the people, so that the voice of each citizen of the country entitled to vote shall be heard and have its weight in determining who shall fill these high positions. I do not consider it necessary to elaborate what I have already said in favor of this portion of the proposed amendments. The proposition is in harmony with what has become a fundamental principle in our theory of government, and that is, that this being a Government of the people, every citizen should have a voice in selecting the magistrates who are to execute the laws, and that the people must be, and are entitled to be, trusted in the decision of any and every question affecting their interest, safety, and welfare. The people voting directly for President and Vice-President, the danger of cabal, intrigue, and corruption, which may be brought about by the use of executive patronage and influence, and which might tempt electors and electoral colleges, will no longer exist unless a majority of the whole people could thus be corrupted or influenced, which is improbable, if not impossible.

And, lastly, the proposed amendment in this respect secures the adoption of the only mode by which the will of the people can be effectually and certainly carried into effect in the important matter of the selection of President and Vice-President.

Second. The proposition embraced in the amendments looks to a vote of the people by districts equal in number to the Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress, to be com posed of contiguous territory, and to be as nearly equal in population as may be. The argument in favor of this plan has been already partially presented. It has been seen that, with the vote of each State for presidential electors cast in solido, the popular will has been sometimes defeated. A very small majority in a State carries the whole electoral vote of that State, as in the case of New York in 1844, hereinbefore mentioned, and that this occurring in, say one-fifth of the States, will elect, notwithstanding there may be in the other States a large popular majority given for the unsuccessful candidate. If, under the amendment proposed, the person having the highest number of votes in each of said districts is entitled to the vote of the district, counting one presidential vote for the person obtaining a majority in the particular district, no such result as that of defeating the popular will can occur.

Under the amendment, the person receiving the highest number of votes in a State it is true, would receive or be entitled to two presidential votes for the State at large, and this is proposed as a just concession to the autonomy of the States as such, which has found its sanction in the almost universal recognition by the people, ever since the formation of the Government, of the wisdom of the framers of our Constitution in providing that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each of the States of the Union. It is also true that under the proposed amendment, if two persons have the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, they shall receive each one presidential vote from the State at large, and that if more than two persons shall have each the same number of votes in any State, it being the highest number, no presidential vote shall be counted. And there can possibly be no valid objection to either of these provisions; for if the vote in any State between two candidates receiving the highest number of votes in that State is divided between them, no principle of fairness and none of the rights of the State are violated by giving the State (so to speak) the benefit of two votes in the count or one vote each to the two candidates; and if more than two candidates each have the same number of votes in a State, being the highest number of votes, it would be simply impossible to divide the two presidential votes for the State at large between the three candidates without giving to each candidate a fraction of a vote.

But notwithstanding these provisions are made in the amendments for securing to each State, or to the candidates having the highest number of votes in the State, two votes for the State at large, yet the important feature or element in the plan proposed is that under it there is to be a vote of the people by districts, which will tend to prevent a defeat of the will of the people, and will have a powerful tendency to prevent frauds in the election.

Under the present system, the States voting solidly, many inducements to fraud exist. Parties are frequently nearly balanced in a State, and fraud in our large cities or in a particular locality may control the electoral vote of an entire State; whereas under the district system proposed by the committee the frauds in our large cities would only affect the vote in the district in which they occurred. The risk and expense will not be incurred to carry the vote of a single district that would be incurred if the result of the fraud was to determine the vote of the whole State, and perhaps secure the election of a President.

Third. The amendment provides that Congress shall have power to provide for conducting the elections of President and Vice-President; and provides also that the States shall be divided into districts by the Legislatures thereof, but that Congress may at any time by law make or alter the same. This proposition is based upon the theory that there should be some uniform constitutional rule upon this subject. The election of a President and Vice-President is a national affair. The whole people of the United States have a deep and direct interest in the result of such an election, and an interest, therefore, not only in the fact that an election shall be held, but in the manner of holding it. And the Congress of the United States, the representative of the people and of the States, the department of the Government in which all national legislative power under the Constitution resides, is the only power which can appropriately and efficiently control in this matter, so vitally important to the interests of the entire people.

The power to appoint electors being conferred by the Constitution of the United States on the State Legislatures, it cannot be taken from them or modified by their State constitutions.

No one doubts that, under the Constitution as it now stands, the Legislatures can at any time repeal all laws providing for the election of electors by the people. The very fact that it is in the power of the Legislatures of the various States, under the present system, to adopt different modes of choosing electors, is suggestive of the necessity of establishing a uniform system or a uniform constitutional rule on the subject; especially as it is apparent that some of the States under the existing system may dispense, as some of them have done in the past, with an election of electors by the people, and thus to that extent defeat the popular will.

Fourth. What I have already said of the dangers which may result from having no tribunal provided by the Constitution for the settlement of contests and questions growing out of elections for President and Vice-President need not be repeated. The amendment now proposed provides that the returns of the election shall be made to the Supreme Court of the United States within thirty days after the election, and that said court shall, under such rules as Congress may adopt, or such as the court, in the absence of law, may adopt, determine any contest in respect of such returns, canvass the same, and declare within ninety days after the election, by public proclamation, who is elected President and who is elected Vice-President.

Without going into a lengthy argument in support of this branch of the proposition, I state that, conceding that it is important (and I think it is vitally important) that there should be a tribunal created by the Constitution for canvassing the returns and determining questions arising thereupon, the plan of having the Supreme Court of the United States to determine these questions is preferable to any other, and mainly because its rulings and decisions, while they are apt to be characterized by an intelligent apprehension and clear understanding of the questions of law and fact involved, will be made with less of partisanship and party bias than that of any tribunal which could be established for the purpose of deciding these questions, and its judgments and rulings would therefore be more likely to be acquiesced in by the people and regarded as a final settlement of the question. The court is independent of the executive department, and so far as it can be is independent also of the other department of the Government; and with the provision in the proposed amendments that "no person who has been a justice of the Supreme Court shall be eligible to the office of President or Vice-President" adopted, that court would be as completely free of any of the motives or influences which would weaken the force of its final adjudications on the questions submitted to it, in the judgment of the country, as that or any other tribunal could be made. And, after all, the sanctions of an indorsement by the people of the United States, or their aquiescence in measures affecting the country, is the most important consideration connected with legislation. The Supreme Court has always enjoyed the confidence of the people of the United States, and their faith in its wisdom and integrity is well founded. I do not mean to intimate a doubt that it will continue to deserve the fullest confidence of the whole country by reporting a proposition to make its members ineligible to the office of President or Vice-President; but it will relieve the court, besides being eminently proper, that as the court is under the proposed amendments to decide questions which may in some cases be decisive of the result of a presidential election, its members should be relieved of the possible imputation of having a personal interest in the action of the court.

Fifth. The amendments now proposed provide that the person having the highest number of presidential votes in the United States shall be President, and so of the Vice-President. This substitutes what is known as the plurality rule for the majority rule. Under the present provision of the Constitution there can be no election except by a majority of all the electoral votes; and if no candidate receives such majority, the election is thrown into the House of Representatives, where the choice is made between the three highest candidates.

By the amendment proposed the candidate receiving the highest number of votes cast in the United States will be elected, although he may not have a majority of all the presidential votes, so that the election in every case is final. This finality of the election is the feature which chiefly recommends the plurality plan; as, being final, it does away with the unfairness and the danger of an election by the House of Representatives. Under the present system of electing a President and Vice-President, unless there is a candidate who has received a majority of the electoral votes, the election is thrown into the House, where, to say nothing of the other elements of unfairness in such an election, as an election not by the people but by the House of Representatives, the voting in the House, although confined to a selection between the candidates, not exceeding three, having the highest number of electoral votes, may result in the selection of a person who is not the choice of a majority or even a plurality of the people of the United States.

The majority should govern; but it is submitted whether, if requiring that a candidate shall receive a majority of the electoral votes, as under the present system, may necessitate a choice by the House of Representatives, and the evils and dangers of such an election as the latter, it would not be best to adopt the amendment proposed, and so make the action of the people final. The people vote for whom they please, and with a full knowledge that the candidate receiving the highest vote is to be declared elected; and there seems to be no good reason why they should be compelled to form themselves into a majority, nor any good reason why, if the candidate has a majority over any other candidate, he should not be declared elected.

It is said that an officer elected by a majority of all the votes cast carries with him a greater moral force and authority than one receiving only a plurality of the votes. But this is doubtful. In every State where this plurality rule is in force, for many years, it has worked well and given satisfaction; and if the amendments now proposed in this regard shall be adopted and ratified, a President and Vice-President elected thereunder who have received a plurality of all the votes cast at a fair election would carry with them the whole moral power of the office. It would be very different from the case of a candidate in the minority at the polls, who had received fewer votes than other candidates, being made President by the vote of the House of Representatives, and different also from the case of one who succeeds to the office of President by the death of the incumbent of that high office.

The moral force of Mr. Polk, General Taylor, Mr. Buchanan, and Mr. Lincoln was not impaired by the fact that they had received a plurality only of all votes cast at the polls.

If the plurality system is adopted, and the people vote directly for President and Vice-President, every voter casts his vote with a full knowledge that the candidates receiving the highest number of votes will be declared elected; and this takes away the inducement to scatter the vote and throw the election into the House, as under the present system. The electoral colleges under the present system in all the States may be chosen by a plurality vote, as there is no provision of law in any of them that the electors shall have a majority of all the votes cast in the State.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have discharged my duty in bringing to the notice of this House and the country the evils of and the objections to the present mode of electing the President and Vice-President, and the danger to the peace of the country if not to the integrity of our institutions, which is imminent, if a remedy is not furnished; and I close by expressing the hope that action will be taken at an early day which will change our present mode of electing President and Vice-President, and provide for settling questions connected therewith.

Affairs in Arkansas.

SPEECH OF HON. LEMUEL TODD,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1875,

On the report of the Select Committee on Affairs in Arkansas.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Speaker, when I first read the report of the majority of the committee on the Arkansas troubles I was struck with profound surprise and wonder; surprise that they could come to the conclusion submitted by them, and wonder that they could publicly give to it the sanction of their names. Subsequent reflection and consideration have not modified or changed my first impressions. That conclusion is a palpable non sequitur from the premises laid down, and would be laughable as a caricature on logic, if the gravity of the question did not transform it into a terrible blunder.

After establishing by indubitable and uncontradicted testimony that Joseph Brooks was in 1872 legally elected governor of Arkansas for four years; that he was fraudulently and shamelessly cheated out of his election and office, and illegally and absolutely denied all remedy for the redress of the wrongs perpetrated against him and the people of Arkansas; that the Legislature which convened in extraordinary session in May, 1874, was packed and suborned; that it by a preconcerted conspiracy and fraud, and in defiance of the express provisions of the State constitution, passed a law calling a constitutional convention; that a constitutional convention thus called did convene and form a constitution and assume powers clearly denied to it; that its ratification was submitted to the people upon conditions and provisions confessedly illegal, oppressive, and revolutionary; that at such election State and county officers were also elected to fill all offices provided under it, and that the officers so elected assumed and took upon themselves their several positions, and displacing all officers elected in 1872, the committee conclude that because all said acts were done under the pretended forms of law, and had not been followed by acts of forcible resistance, and because peace now prevailed throughout the State, neither Congress nor any other department of the Government should take any action in regard to the State government of Arkansas—a most strange, unhappy, and illogical conclusion; one that violates, contemns, and tramples down, in my judgment, every principle of law and every cardinal rule of representative government; one that sanctifies crime and canonizes the criminal, that substitutes wrong for right, that legalizes successful crime, and puts conquered virtue under the ban of condemnation; one that will prove an incentive to revolutionary and mob violence, that will encourage and develop conspiracy, perjury, and fraud, and stimulate wild, reckless, and lawless men to essay, by murder and revolution, the overthrow of established governments—a conclusion that is subversive of the American idea of representative government, and that is utterly destructive of the rights of minorities, who, under its recognition and dominion, would be absolutely at the mercy of a dominant and lawless majority.

The element of success ought not to be recognized in determining the right or the wrong of any given question, nor can it hallow and legalize an action which in itself is wrong and in violation of law. As well might the burglar who consummates his midnight robbery only by murdering the householder plead immunity from punishment because he thereby escaped with his plunder. A theft of authority does not validate an order any more than the sale of stolen property vests title in the purchaser. Any action, whatever, to be valid and binding, must rest on a basis of right or lawful authority. If it is destitute of these attributes, it cannot infuse legal life into its corrupt and lawless form, nor claim recognition as a legal expression. It is therefore no argument in support of the party claiming to be the legal officials of the State of Arkansas that their conspiracy was successful, and that under the thin disguise of usurped and stolen forms of law their labors were crowned with victory. Rather should the fact of success blacken the character of the conspirators and quicken the processes by which they should be brought to condign punishment; for if there be degrees in guilt, the man who fails to consummate his crime, stands in a more venial position than the bold villain who brazens his in the face of the public.

Nor is there any force in the argument that peace has prevailed in Arkansas since the inauguration of Garland. Such a condition, in the light of all the facts that have transpired before and since that event, proves nothing in favor of the party in power, but is rather a splendid tribute to the law-abiding character and conduct of Governor Brooks and his friends, who, confiding in the justice and right of their cause, have appealed to the law, to us, to the constituted authorities, for redress and protection in preference to a resort to the arbitrament of arms and the shedding of blood. Cruelly stripped of their rights at home, insolently refused a hearing or redress, barred out of the courts by acts of Assembly, insulted, maltreated, calumniated, driven almost to desperation, outlawed, and a price set upon their heads, they still remain law-abiding men, calm in the consciousness of their own rectitude, making their appeal to us, who alone have power to give them an adequate remedy and full protection. Throughout long months of weary waiting, after having clearly and fully demonstrated the truth and righteousness of their case, they are at last met with an unaccountable denial and told, "True, Governor Brooks was legally elected; true he has been cheated out of his office, and all remedy and redress have been denied him by every tribunal of his State, both legislative and judicial; true the State government and constitution have been overthrown by conspirators and the offices filled by intruders; true all these acts were lawless and revolutionary; true you have protested against all these acts and throughout peacefully claimed your rights, and are not barred by any consent or apparent acquiescence; yet because the revolution has been successfully accomplished, and because peace reigns in the State, we will shut from view all these lawless enormities, trample upon principle and constitutional obligations, and throw wide open a door that leads to turbulence, crime, revolution, and the destruction of the very foundations upon which our American system of government rests for security and power." Sir, peace reigned in Warsaw when Poland's bravest and best lay dead and ghastly in the streets of that city, victims to the remorseless tyranny of Russia and murdered because they dared to do battle for home, country, and liberty. Peace reigned in New Orleans in September last after the white-leaguers had by force of arms overthrown the State government and after red-handed murder had strewn the streets with his gory victims. The same system of terrorism which silenced and cowed into submission the people of Warsaw and New Orleans now triumphs in Arkansas, ready and willing through her "young men who cannot be restrained" to kill and slaughter all who resist their sway or dare to interfere with the dominant power.

I deny both the correctness and the policy of the resolution submitted by the majority of the committee. Indeed, they do not seem to have full confidence in it themselves, and, as if in serious doubt of their own judgment, refer the decision of the question to the judgment of the House. A tone of uncertainty and irresolution seems to pervade the whole report, indicative of a desire to get rid of the subject and to condemn all its palpable enormities as the easiest method of disposing of it. They do not earnestly and courageously grasp the question and probe it to its depths, but throughout touch it gingerly, palliating its rough features and lightly dismissing the grave questions involved, as if insensible to their magnitude and far-reaching importance and as if languidly indifferent to results. To me the whole report is unsatisfactory in spirit, treatment, and conclusion, unworthy of the distinguished gentlemen constituting the majority of the committee, and evasive of the stern duty which was committed to their charge. I think they should have, even from their own premises, arrived at a different conclusion and pronounced an emphatic condemnation against the lawless and revolutionary proceedings in Arkansas, by which a government was overthrown and the functions of its officials usurped; and that they should have resolutely insisted upon calling into requisition the Federal power to reinstate and protect the lawful authorities of the State, and to punish with due severity the conspirators who organized the plot and are now enjoying the plunder. It seems to me that a wider and more comprehensive consideration of the subject than the majority of the committee have taken would have brought their views and judgments into full accord with those of the Executive, who has clearly and sharply comprehended the situation and suggested the appropriate solution. Thoroughly familiar with the subject and alive to its great magnitude and suggestive influence on communities similar in character and situation, the President, guided by his quick perception, resolute and sublime courage, and unswerving devotion to duty, foresees all the logical results of the coup d'état, the necessity of throwing athwart its progress the power of the General Government, and destroying it before the contagion of its evil example infects other States and again plunges us into the vortex of civil war, with all its waste of blood and treasure. I fully subscribe to his view of the case, and solemnly believe that a rejection of it by Congress will lead to the most lamentable and deplorable results, in the midst of which may perish the very structure of our Government. Like a faithful and watchful sentinel, the President has sounded the alarm, pointed out the danger, and called for adequate and appropriate means to arrest the destruction that menaces the Republic and the sovereignty of the law. It is our duty to heed the warning and courageously meet the evil and conquer it. If we fail in this our imperative duty, either through indifference or cowardice, and calamity comes upon the country, as it assuredly will, then will the people hold us to a stern accountability, and heap upon our recreant heads the full measure of their indignation and wrath. Why should we not interfere to crush out the usurping government in Arkansas? The occasion justifies and the law demands it. The wrong has been committed and the remedy is ample; why not employ it? If the facts as presented are true, how can we evade the performance of our duty? And that they are true no one denies who has impartially investigated them.

It is true no precedent exactly meets the case in all its phases, and we must therefore depend on original construction for the power of Congress over the premises. The nearest analogy to the question before us is found in the famous Rhode Island case. Although the facts differ, the underlying principle is the same. In the Rhode Island case the call for the interposition of Federal authority was made on the President by the existing and established authorities of the State. The charter government contained no provision for its amendment and alteration, and the attempt to overthrow it was a voluntary and spontaneous act on the part of a majority of the people outside of and in defiance of any authority conferred under the form of law. In that instance it was held to be the duty of the Executive to protect the established government by the employment of the military and naval forces, and, if need be, crush out by force of arms an insurrection against it. In this case the demand for Federal interference is made upon Congress from a State whose constitution contained provisions for its own amendment and alteration by a dethroned body of officials, who affirm that they have been ousted from their positions by usurpation, fraud, intimidation, and a violation in essential and fundamental particulars of the constitution and laws of the State. The same principle applies to both cases and governs them, and that is to guarantee to every State a government resting its claim for recognition and protection upon the fact of its legality. If the government of Rhode Island could not be overthrown by the spontaneous action of a majority of its people, because it was voluntary and not in conformity with law, how does the case differ in principle from the one in hand, where the government and all official positions under it have been stolen, and the thieves, calling themselves rightful and legal owners, proceeded in violation of existing law to dispose of the property or constitution and substitute one of their own making in its stead? Both aimed by illegal processes to destroy legally existing governments; one by force, the other by fraud; one openly and upon the idea of the absolute sovereignty of the people, the other by fraud, usurpation, and prostitution of the name and personation of law. No matter how accomplished, that change is illegal which is effected under no legal authority. It is the substance we must regard, and not the empty name or machinery employed; and it is idle to call that a republican government, even if so in form, which has been illegally established in contravention of fundamental law, in violation of the rights of the people, in disregard of their wishes, and to which they never assented. In Arkansas the actors in the revolution which overthrew its government were volunteers as real and actual as those in the Rhode Island project, and are entitled to no more respect and consideration, and should be as summarily dealt with and punished. Their evil work should be destroyed, and the legitimate government be restored to its own place and authority. These are my profoundest convictions; and so convinced am I of their thorough truth, that I am eager and willing to correct and punish the outrage which has been perpetrated on the State of Arkansas, and to employ the whole power of the General Government in so holy an enterprise; and to accomplish this effectively I invoke the co-operation of every law-abiding member of this House.

Security of Elections.

SPEECH OF HON. R. HAMILTON,

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a most extraordinary bill. It is full of laughable comedy, and it forebodes terrible tragedy. It should be entitled "A bill to put in force the suggestions of General Sheridan's telegrams to President Grant." It provides for enabling the President to proclaim the people of the South, in such districts as he may prescribe, insurgents; to suspend the writ of habeas corpus and to set up military government and control over them, with doubtless the rest left to General Sheridan for his disposal.

The party in power have from stride to stride trampled down the rights of the States until they have nearly overrun and subverted all State governments. It only remains to give this bill the force of an enactment to divest the people of every vestige of the great inherent principle of self-government.

The patriots of the Revolution cared but little about the paltry tax on tea or the trifling stamp duty; it was the principle they contended for. "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute," was their motto. It was the great right of self-government they contended for; it was that upon which they based their Declaration of Independence, for which they struggled through a seven years' war. To secure this the people of the respective colonies formed for themselves independent State governments.

If the people of New Jersey cannot govern themselves, what matters to them whether their internal affairs are regulated by the British Parliament or by a great national despotism at Washington with a military chieftain at its head? It is true in this branch of the National Government they have seven members; but what are they in a body of nearly three hundred, and what are two in the other branch in a body of seventy-four?

The blind devotion to party sways the national legislation entirely to the service of party purposes, and if untrammeled by the Constitution of the Federal Government it may be made, as the attempt is made by this bill, to serve the purposes of a selfish, ambitious man to continue and perpetuate his control over the affairs of the country. The British government to-day pays more respect to the expressed will of its subjects than the Administration at Washington does to the expressed will of the American people. When there is a clear expression of the popular sentiment against the British ministers, they at once throw up the seals of office and resign, and a ministry is formed in accordance with that sentiment. How diverse is the case with the Administration at Washington. Instead of showing any respect to the emphatically expressed will of the people at the last election, every effort is made and every scheme resorted to, however reprehensible, to thwart that will, to circumvent and nullify it.

There was a time in the past history of the country when to be an American citizen was a proud, high privilege, only equaled by that of the Roman citizen when the Roman Empire had universal sway; but the privilege of the American citizen has become of little worth as far as the protection of his personal liberty is concerned. With all our boasted American liberty, the rights of the British subject are better secured and his personal liberty has better guarantees than those of an American citizen.

Since the time of Charles II no sovereign upon the throne of Great Britian has ever dared to deny or deprive a British subject of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. That writ is regarded as another magna charta of that kindom. But how is this great writ for the protection of personal liberty regarded in these United States? How does this bill propose to respect it? It proposes to respect it under the control of a military chieftain, who is seeking, against the example of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, against the long-established and approved usage of the presidential tenure, to secure a continuation of executive power. He by this bill is to be invested with the power, when in his judgment the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. Having the power, who can doubt that he will find the occasion, in his judgment, to warrant its exercise.

If the farcical causes named in the first three sections of the bill are sufficient, then indeed will he be able doubtless to find the occasion. They could be very readily gotten up for the purpose.

I have suggested that this bill was full of laughable comedy. Look at the first section and imagine two persons—all that are required by that section—invading a State to forcibly overthrow its government; two men forcibly overturning a State government! It wants an imagination equal to Jack Falstaff's, when he met the men in buckram, to take in that case; and then by the same section it is declared that if two persons conspire with another person with intent to commit such unlawful purpose, without doing anything further all are to be deemed guilty of felony. What a code is there, my country! No three persons must imagine the overthrow of a State government; if they do it is felony, and they may be punished by fine to the amount of $10,000 and imprisoned ten years. They would deserve some punishment for their asinine folly in supposing they could overturn a State government; but for that innocent folly it would be hard to punish them so severely.

The second section is still more farcical and absurd.

The third section proposes to establish the humane principle of adjudging a person guilty presumptively; and I presume, although not so declared in the bill, would be allowed to prove himself innocent if he can.

The sixth section proposes that the Federal Government shall take cognizance of the crime of murder within the States.

The first, second, third, and fourth sections are simply and clearly only offenses against a State and State laws, and not within the constitutional reach of Congress.

By the first section, if two persons come over from New York into New Jersey and there interfere in any unlawful manner with the execution of the laws of New Jersey, as by preventing an officer serving an attachment or other writ or any like interference, or if two persons conspire with any other person for such unlawful purposes with intent to commit the same, without any further action, each person in any such case is to be deemed guilty of a felony and may be punished by fine to the amount of $10,000 and imprisoned ten years.

By the second section, if any two persons shall conspire together to overthrow by force or to usurp by violence the State government of any of the States, or shall attempt to subvert or usurp by force or violence any State government or any department thereof, each person is to be deemed guilty of a felony, punishable by fine to the amount of $5,000 and by imprisonment to the extent of twenty years.

The seventh section provides that the United States courts shall have, exclusively of the State courts, jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses declared such by the said act. So that the State courts cannot enforce the laws of the State, or protect the State or its citizens from infractions of its laws or breaches of its peace.

This legislation is a clear usurpation of the rights of the States and of the people of the States to enforce their own State laws for their own protection.

It is patent to all who may read that this bill is intended to serve mere political party interests, without regard to constitutional right or the welfare or interest of the country.

Louisiana, and a Review of the Republican Party.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES M. LEACH,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1875,

On the Louisiana question and the general political situation of affairs in the country.

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, military despotism has struck down constitutional liberty in a coequal sovereign State of this nation; and if the people of the United States, the only safe custodians of the ark of the covenant of the nation's liberties, are ready with craven pusillanimity to submit to such monstrous despotism and to hear the ominous drum-beat sounding the death-knell of freedom, and witness undismayed the charge of bristling bayonets, expelling from the hall of the Legislature of a State constitutionally-elected members thereof, without the most solemn protest and indignant rebuke, then indeed may the same unchecked military power ruthlessly crush out, by the exercise of the same tyranny, the sovereign rights and liberties of any and every State of the great sisterhood and fix upon the bowed necks of the degenerate descendants of the heroes and statesmen who bequeathed them freedom and the right of self-government, the galling yoke of perpetual enslavement.

Sir, shall this meditated crime against civil liberty, already begun, be permitted to progress to its wicked consummation; to the disgrace, degradation, and enthrallment, of a people, whose rich and grand heritage of country and ancestry are so glorious? I say with solemn emphasis, and in the name of the Constitution and of human liberty, that this must not be. For one I enter my protest against this wicked scheme to overthrow public liberty. This warning is not prematurely given, nor the alarm too soon sounded; because civil liberty and the sacred right of self-government have been destroyed in Louisiana by the nation's Executive through his military satraps, ay, twice has the civil government of that grievously oppressed State been stricken down by the despotic will of one man.

Sir, why may not, upon the same principle and assumption of power and for the same reason, that of the continued maintenance of the supremacy of republican rule, President Grant through General Sheridan, or any other supple adulator of power, enter this Hall of the people's Representatives next winter, when the democratic party shall assume control here, and expel at the point of the bayonet, precisely as was done in Louisiana, a sufficient number of democratic members to restore his lost ascendency in both ends of the Capitol? There is nothing to prevent it; and inferring the future from the past, and witnessing in this conduct and other unconstitutional stretches of power the manifest tendency in that direction, the question becomes one of solemn, profound significance, and every man of calm thought must see it, every man whose heart glows with patriotism must feel with anxious forebodings the impending danger that imperils constitutional liberty. And if these things so threatening and dangerous to the country's peace, and to the people's freedom are so, should not the highest considerations of public duty and the loftiest emotions of an enlarged patriotism impel this House to rebuke this high-handed usurpation, and gross violation of the Constitution by the Executive, instead of defending him or apologizing for these acts, or tamely submitting without a word of denunciation from this co-ordinate branch of the Government charged with the people's rights and liberties, and certainly responsible to some extent for such lawless acts of another co-ordinate department unless these acts shall be condemned and the author of them rebuked?

I come now briefly to the facts. On November 4, 1872, an election was held in pursuance of the laws and constitution of Louisiana, held under the auspices and control of the republican party, at which John McEnery was elected governor by more than ten thousand majority of the votes polled, and a democratic Legislature was elected. Immediately before the assembling of the Legislature a drunken judge, (Durell,) and confessedly corrupt, on the night of December 5, issued an order to Marshal Packard—admitted by a republican committee to have been illegal and void—to take possession of the State-house, which was done, and the usurper, Kellogg, was installed as governor by the military, and a fraudulent, bogus Legislature put in power by order of the Attorney-General of the United States, acting under authority from the President. Messrs. CARPENTER, LOGAN, ALCORN, and ANTHONY, republican Senators of the Committee of Investigation into Louisiana Affairs, in their report, among other things, said:

> It is impossible to conceive of a more irregular, illegal, and in every way inexcusable act on the part of a judge. It has not even the form of judicial process, and had no more legal effect than an order issued by any private citizen.

Such were the means, as here set forth on high republican authority, by which the usurper, Kellogg, and the bogus Legislature were forced upon the people and installed in office by the bayonet in 1872, and kept in office by the same military power through the second election of last year and up to this time.

The same committee hold the following language in regard to that election:

> Your committee are therefore led to the conclusion that if the election in November, 1872, be not void for frauds committed, McEnery and his associates in State offices and the persons certified as members of the State Legislature by the De Feriet board ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State.

Such is the plain language of that committee and such their conclusions. But Casey, the collector of the port, and a brother-in-law of the President, telegraphs the President as follows:

> Durell's decree is sweeping, and if enforced will save the republican party and give Louisiana a republican Legislature and State government.

The corrupt Durell's "void and illegal" decree and order, supplemented by this significant telegram, does the work, and the wicked usurpation is established by armed soldiers, and the usurper Kellogg is put and maintained in power by military force, without which this man could not retain his place one hour. Sir, I ask you and this House if despotism in the destruction of the local government of a State and in open violation of the Constitution can go further or reach a lower depth than this? The corrupt tool, Durell, having performed his appointed work for Kellogg and his friends, resigns the office he disgraced to avoid impeachment; but the other high functionaries of this public outrage in dismantling a State of her governmental rights—the President, the Attorney-General, Kellogg, Casey, and Packard—still hold high places, unrebuked by Congress or by any general denunciation by the dominant party of the country.

After two long weary years to that gallant people, signalized by the usurpers by wicked misrule, shameless corruption, and oppressive taxation, another election is held with the same result—the triumphant success of the democratic party—the people by their votes hurling from power the usurping minority; but, alas! the bad precedent established two years previous, by which the radical minority were put in power over the majority, is again invoked, and the President interferes a second time, and armed soldiers with fixed bayonets rally at the drum-beat, and while the Legislature is being organized five of its members are ruthlessly expelled in defiance of their solemn protests against such a lawless outrage, by military force from the legislative hall; and thus a second time the inalienable right of self-government is disregarded and civil liberty stricken down in this devoted State; soon after which General Sheridan is placed in command, and at once disgraces his high office and tarnishes the distinguished name he made during the war by a sanguinary dispatch to this city on the 5th of January, in which he invokes Congress to pass a law declaring a portion of the citizens of the State "banditti," so as to enable him to try the free citizens of a sovereign State by military commission, expressing the opinion in the dispatch that if this were done, and the President would issue a proclamation also declaring them "banditti," no further action need be taken except that which would devolve on him.

Sir, what must calm and righteous-minded men think of this bloody dispatch, of its animus and character? Surely it must somewhat dim the luster of the name acquired in the late sad war, and I reckon the good sense of the country and respect for civil power over military, generally felt, will be likely to conclude that such temper and bitter prejudice, coupled with such premeditated despotism, wholly unfits him from dealing fairly or justly by that State or in any matter pertaining to civil affairs, and that truthful history will pass his name down the ages as a sanguinary officer and a cruel tyranny, and by a slight change of the celebrated lines of Byron on the great parliamentary orator and dramatist of the same name will probably feel—

> Thankful "that nature formed but one such man,
> And broke the die in molding Sheridan."

Sir, can this Government long stand when military rule is usurping the place of civil power in the States and over the country? Louisiana to-day lies prostrate under the tyrannic heel of the wicked, shameless Kellogg, whose name is the synonym of malfeasance, corruption, and cowardice, and who is despised by his own party, but tolerated and kept in power to be used as a supple tool to prolong radical domination in that State. His true character is fitly portrayed by Junius, who, in speaking of a much greater and better man, said:

Ignoble villain, craven coward, fatiguing public indignation; buoyant solely with corruption, he only rises as he rots.

In proof I do no injustice to this bad man and to the despotism he exercises in his oppressive rule over that chivalrous people, I will quote from the report of the committee of this House sent down to investigate her condition, consisting of two prominent republicans (Messrs. FOSTER and PHELPS,) and one democrat, (Mr. POTTER,) the profound lawyer and able statesman, whose talents, whose high integrity, and whose courteous manners have won the respect of both parties. This committee report:

The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was a usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg legislature abolishing existing courts and judges, and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; by changes in the laws, centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the supervision of the elections; by continuing the returning board, with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of State militia, subject to the command of the governor; by the creation in some places of monopolies in markets, gas-making, water-works, and ferries, cleaning vaults and removing filth, and doing work as wharfingers; by the abolition of courts with elective judges, and the substitution of other courts with judges appointed by Kellogg, in evasion of the constitution of the State; by enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board; by unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks issued during the years 1870 and 1872; by laws declaring that no persons in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State or be allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—measures which, when coupled with the extraordinary burdens of taxation, have served to vest, in the language of Governor Kellogg's counsel, "a degree of power in the Governor of a State scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world."

But the reduction of wages, the non-fulfillment of personal or political pledges, the misfeasance of some local officials, disputes among the leading colored persons in other localities, the loss or embezzlement in some cases of the school funds, and the failure of the Freedman's Bank, all combined to divide the views of colored voters during the late campaign. An effort was accordingly made by the conservatives to acquire a part of the negro vote; with that view it was sought in many quarters to propitiate them. Frequent arrests by the United States marshals for intimidation or threats of non-employment, and the apprehension that was felt that the returning board would count out their men if excuse for such a course were offered, all combined, especially after the 14th of September, to put the conservatives on their good behavior, and the result was that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the sad portrayal of this ruined, impoverished, prostrate State, ruined and dismantled by the pretorian guards of the Executive and his subordinates, and, let it be remembered, is made by able gentlemen a majority of whom are republicans, and therefore more likely to underestimate than to overstate or exaggerate the facts. Here we have some of the fruits and beauties of reconstruction; shackles put upon a sovereign State, fettering and binding her down at the remorseless feet of military power; the sacred right of local self-government, this grand underlying principle of American liberty, denied a free people. However anxious the dominant party in this Congress may be to subordinate what must be their natural love of liberty and constitutional obligation to the unworthy consideration of party ascendency and prolongation of power in permitting such high-handed acts of usurpation to go unrebuked, but seeking rather to bolster up their party instead of sternly rebuking those doings and taking immediate action to restore this State to her civil liberty and her well-defined constitutional rights, I think I am not mistaken in the opinion that every official responsibility with these proceedings will merit and will receive the emphatic censure of the American people. I cannot believe this nation will sanction them.

The republican party will soon find, in my opinion, if they have not already, that they have assumed a monstrous responsibility and heavy burden that no party can carry; for surely the people of this country will not long permit its civil institutions to be imperiled by encroachment or threatened by subversion. By such frequent resorts to military force to control elections or organize legislative bodies this is done. It cannot be possible that such gradual but persistent encroachments by the republican party on popular rights, and such gross violations of the Constitution, have so steeped the minds of the people into such quietism of indifference and dazed apathy as to contemplate without serious apprehension and dreadful alarm the imminent perils that environ freedom and threaten the destruction of liberty. If so, this precious boon, planned by the wisdom and cemented by the blood of a heroic and illustrious ancestry, and bequeathed to their descendants as the richest heritage of man, must ere long, amid the clash of arms and the anarchy and conflict of military despots, go down in blood and be lost and perish forever.

I conclude what I have to say on this question by quoting from the Nestor of the American press, that true patriot and poet William Cullen Bryant, himself a republican, whose opinion it will be seen is less creditable to General Sheridan and his dispatch and conduct than what I as an independent freeman have ventured to express of him. In the course of a great speech, delivered in New York to an immense outpouring of the people in sympathy with his views, Mr. Bryant said:

What authority, fellow-citizens, is there in these provisions for the President to set himself up as the judge of elections and drag from the legislative chamber those whom he chooses to regard as having no right to their seats? He might as well, if he should be a candidate for a third term of the Presidency, send his minions to disperse the electoral colleges in those States which shall refuse him their vote. He might as well send another Sheridan to pull the gentleman whom we have just elected governor of this State out of the executive chair. He might with just as good a warrant disperse this meeting by sending a band of armed men to clear this hall at the point of the bayonet.

How happens it that men educated to the profession of arms at our national military school seem not to understand what are the rights of the citizens and what the due limits of the military power? If General Sheridan, that daring soldier, but despiser of civil rights, had either been properly trained or had not forgotten his training he would never have obeyed the mandate which ordered him to New Orleans on that guilty errand. He would have said, "I owe my education to this Republic; I was brought up to be its soldier and servant and not the vassal of the President. I have taken my life in my hand and gone into the civil war to defend and preserve the Constitution of my country, and I will not raise my hand to violate it. I would almost as soon cut the throat of my mother. I would tear off my epaulets and break my sword and fling the fragments into the Potomac sooner than go upon so impious an errand." That is what he should have said.

But, Mr. Speaker, has the destruction of civil government in Louisiana stayed the march of republican misrule and invasion of the people's rights in other States? No, sir; for the President in his recent special message threatens the overthrow of another State, the autonomy of which does not suit his present views, because, as I apprehend, its government officials are not in sympathy with his administration, and so the State of Arkansas is in great danger of annihilation and its present government must be destroyed if he carries out the threat contained in his message; for notwithstanding he countenanced last year the recognition of the Baxter government, in virtue of which Brooks had to yield and Baxter became governor, he now changes about, and like Saturn destroying his own offspring, threatens to destroy it and to install as governor by means of his favorite persuasive, the bayonet, the vagabond adventurer Brooks; and here is as complete a political somersault as the country has lately seen. The President means by the tenor of this message to strike down the government of this State, expel Governor Garland, and inaugurate Brooks in his place, unless the report of the Committee on Arkansas Affairs, with the distinguished gentleman from Vermont (Mr. POLAND) at its head, shall by the decisive action of this House prevent this premeditated wrong in striking down the popular will and self government in that State. I trust the action of this House by indorsing the report of this committee will exert such a salutary influence on the mind of the Executive as to prevent further interference there, for bold and self-willed as he is it would require, in my opinion, more moral courage than he or any other man possesses to defy the action of Congress or attempt to override such action so emphatically expressed.

The alleged irregularity of the new constitution of Arkansas, as alluded to by the President in his message, is merely technical, and has been cured and the new constitution ratified by an overwhelming majority of the people, and the President has as much legal authority to write out a constitution himself for that State, and by means of his armed soldiery compel its acceptance and ratification by the people, as to reinstate the old discarded constitution after the people, by authority of the Legislature, have established a new one; for this would be but another unwarranted stretch of Federal power, still further imperiling the people's liberties.

Mr. Speaker, in reviewing the action of this Administration touching public measures of general interest, as was my purpose in the outset, I come now to a brief consideration of that most iniquitous act lately passed miscalled the civil-rights bill, and I propose to show how and by what revolutionary means this bill became a law, its purpose and tendency, and its odious discrimination in favor of the negro and against the white race; presenting to the country the despicable spectacle of class legislation by which the negro has superior privileges to the white man.

There has existed for seventy years a wholesome rule of Congress protecting minorities against hasty, oppressive, sectional, and class legislation by the majority; and this wise parliamentary rule, established by the fathers and consecrated by time, is repealed and destroyed with ruthless, sacrilegious hand in order to further oppress and try the patience of the Southern States, and force upon an unwilling country this nefarious bill, aided by those dexterous party appliances by which supple adulators of power were brought to marshal their disintegrating forces for this struggle of wrong over right, and march to the rescue of an Administration that is losing alike its prestige and its power, and that was repudiated last fall by the people at the ballot-box, and that now hopes by this act to goad by such aggravating and cumulative oppression the Southern States to desperation and resistance, and then by billeting armed soldiers over the Southern States to carry the next presidential election.

Sir, they fail to understand how a brave, grand people, who have suffered so much, borne so much, are able to submit to more and still keep the peace, and that they are resolved with stern fortitude and firm purpose of soul to exhibit to the country and the world the loftiest heroism and the sublimest moral courage that have ever been recorded in the history of nations. Yes, sir, the South will keep the peace, submit to this outrageous legislation as best they can;

will struggle on in patient, proud forbearance, will continue to have hope and faith and trust in God, for they believe that the day of their redemption draweth near. They believe that the better class of men—the calm, thoughtful, patriotic men—by hundreds of thousands from all sections will come to the rescue and relief of the devoted South, so grievously oppressed, plundered, impoverished, taxed, and well-nigh ruined by local and national legislation. They believe that the section which gave to the infant colonies George Washington to lead them through sacrifice and suffering, through the dark pathways of war and blood into the bright sunlight of independence and liberty, and who as first President (and best of all) started the young Republic on the road to greatness and to glory, and who planted the country's institutions on the eternal rock of truth and justice and freedom, and whose successors from the same section controlled with wisdom and statesmanship, the politics and legislation of the nation for more than half a century of its existence in all three of its wisely adjusted departments, during which period the country became happy and prosperous—great and glorious at home and among the nations of the earth—they believed that such a people are not to be doomed to perpetual injustice and oppression, but that those impoverished, enthralled, down-trodden Southern States will soon be disenthralled and raised where they properly belong, to the dignity of coequals among the great sisterhood.

I shall not stop to argue the palpable unconstitutionality of this civil-rights bill further than to say that the principle, as decided in the well-known Slaughter-house cases, settles the question, and if adhered to this law must be declared by the highest judicial tribunal of the nation unconstitutional; for it would be a monstrous doctrine to hold that the rights, privileges, and immunities belonging to the citizens of the States could be modified, limited, interfered with, or controlled by the Federal Government. If this could be done in one case it could be in any and every conceivable case, and if this were true, then local self-government had as well be abandoned and State lines obliterated and the Federal Government declared to be consolidated and supreme.

Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say there is no conceivable civil right that appertains to or is possessed by any white man in the United States that does not equally belong to and is possessed by the negro. Not one. For the first time in the history of the country a penalty is imposed for refusing a meal or the accommodation of a bed to a negro; ay, sir, a penalty of $500 for every such refusal, and, worse still, the owner of the hotel is also subjected by indictment to fine and imprisonment, while such refusal to a white man gives him no right to the penalty and no power to indict; but he is left only to the uncertain chances of recovering a few dollars, if perchance anything, by suit at common law. And the same discrimination applies to railroads, steamboats, and churches. It is thus seen that, by the terms of this most unjust and infamous bill, for the first time preference and advantages are given the negro over the white man; not that he or his future welfare is cared as much for by those that supported this act (for the purpose of securing his vote) as by his former owners and those among whom he lives. There is conferred upon the negro by the constitutions and laws of all the States (including the southern ones) equal political and civil rights with the white man. He has the same right to acquire and hold property, the same right to prosecute and defend suits before the courts, the same right to vote, and the same right to hold office; and the civil-rights champions have sought in vain to cite a single instance where any Southern State has denied him any right or privilege whatever that belongs to the white race.

If there shall ever be found on the historic records of civilized legislation a more pitiable spectacle and a sadder commentary on Caucasian degradation than that of seeing a white man standing up in an enlightened assemblage of legislators of a mighty nation and speaking and voting to place himself, his children, and his race in a condition of inferiority to the negro or any other race, I reckon it would be found—it certainly would in surpassing ludicrousness and farcical insolence—by witnessing in the same great assembly a negro, but recently an ignorant bondsman, standing up with rolling eyes and uplifted hands crying out lustily for more privileges! more liberty! Another and the most malign and wicked object of this law is to force on the Southern States, by legislation, social equality. Indeed the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. BOUTWELL,) bolder, more fanatical, and more radical than others, has in effect said so, and declared for social equality, urging the necessity and propriety of mixed schools for both races and sexes; the same studies, same forms, same lessons, same training; so as to break down the social barriers and prejudices that now divide the two races.

Sir, such sentiments fill me with horror. A measure so unnecessary, so unjust, so unnatural, and so unholy shocks every emotion of my nature. Are we to be told here, at the close of the nineteenth century, in this free and Christian land, that the only means of securing peace and liberty at the South is by a system of compulsory education of white and black children in the same schools; and that system to be supported by public taxation? After two hundred years of struggle and sacrifice on this continent and eight centuries by our ancestors of similar struggle and sacrifice in England, are we to be informed that all of the inheritances of liberty, and all the securities of law, are to be lost to eight millions of American freemen, unless this deformed and aborted creation of fanaticism is embraced by us? You can accomplish no such work; it is an impossibility, moral and fundamental.

Much has been borne, as I have said, and can be borne by the South. There may yet be in store for us some deeper mortification, some sterner humiliation and more exquisite torture of soul; but I cannot believe this cruel cup of social equality will ever be pressed to our lips. In some way even-handed justice brings her retributions, for as you sow, so shall you reap. Human opinion and sentiment cannot be controlled by force; the divine inspirations defy your physical power. All the persecutions of the Dark Ages only strengthened Christianity. Thank God that he has made this intellectual being, these thoughts that soar aloft and wander through eternity, immaterial and chainless! The mind laughs at fetters and prison-bars. Has fanaticism no limits; will nothing satisfy its mad and insatiate demands?

Is it not enough that the light of education and knowledge is as open to the negro as the light of day? Must you take the tender minds and budding hearts of our children, that from their pure lives you may obliterate the light of nature and of God? Must their gentle limbs be bound and chained by law in iron contact with the negro race that this crucible of fanaticism may be made? I have too much faith in divine justice and mercy to believe it. Are the respectable honest white men of North Carolina and the South ready for this, and willing to submit to such burning indignity? If so, they are unworthy of the justly proud name of Carolinians, and are fast sinking to a degradation, the depths of which cannot be sounded by plummet.

But it is said that this bill I am briefly reviewing already enacted, together with the "force bill" sought to be, are rendered necessary by the disturbed condition of affairs South, to compel that section to do justice to the negro, and that oppressive and punitive legislation are the surest means of effecting this. I have already said there were five or six years ago acts of lawlessness in North Carolina by roving bands of reckless men, but since that period there is no community on the globe that has been more uniformly pacific and law-abiding; and by way of comparison, not of crimination, I say that during any year within the period named there have been more than twice as many crimes committed in Massachusetts as in North Carolina, and the criminal statistics of those States show it. I go further, and assert that during those unfortunate disturbances the four secret organizations of the republican party committed more crimes than the two secret organizations of the democratic party. The lawless acts of the one were suppressed or lightly passed over, while those of the other were with exaggerated mendacity blazoned to the world by characterless radicals of both races, who lived and battened on the slanders they heaped on the South—perjured witnesses and spies, mean, vicious, and vindictive. And while those lawless acts of Ku-Klux were regarded by many as but the minute-guns of distress of a people impoverished, burned out, oppressed, ruined, and goaded to desperation, yet it is a well-known truth that no leading or prominent man was there then or since in the whole State in sympathy with those crimes or who did not denounce them. I declared this in a speech delivered in this House in the early part of last Congress, and invited the strictest inquiry, and its truth has never been questioned. From the day of the surrender of that pure man and noble hero, General Lee, I have spoken and written for peace and good feeling, for fealty to law and order, and for national reunion; ay, sir—

> For a union of hands and union of hearts,
> And the flag of the Union forever!

And the same is true of all the public and leading men of the State; and had the same spirit been manifested by our northern fellow-citizens—the leaders of public sentiment—and the work of reconstruction been begun and carried on in kindness, in justice, in fraternal feeling, and an enlightened statesmanship, long ere this peace and harmony and a restored brotherhood and smiling prosperity would have happily abounded all over this great nation. But slippery demagogues and aspiring sectional politicians, with bosoms rankling with hate, greedily seized upon a few facts and many vile falsehoods, and weaving them together in a dirty patchwork of slander, spread them broadcast over all the North, to be read as exhibiting the true condition and real sentiments of the South; and thus the wicked work has gone on and the northern mind been misled until recently, when the patriotic men of that great section are coming to learn how matters really are, to detect those miserable misrepresentations and wicked falsehoods, and to despise the mean artifices by which they are sought to be kept up—seeing that the effect is ruining the South, and as a natural consequence crippling commerce, depressing business, closing manufactories, shutting up shops, and turning out, all over the northern States, upon the charities of a cold world, hundreds of thousands of mechanics, workmen, and laborers, with their helpless, crying families. And here may be found some of the beauties of reconstruction, so seriously affecting and deeply injuring the people of the North. The late elections, thank God, furnish proof that they are beginning to see clearly, and feel deeply, the true condition of things, and to comprehend the unjust legislation that is incidentally, but unmistakably, bringing them so fast to want and misery; for God is just, and retribution often overtakes nations and men in this world.

In this connection I beg to allude briefly to a long and elaborate speech made recently, in the other end of this buiding, by a distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. LOGAN) in which he took occasion, among a hundred other fancy utterances in that intensely radical speech, to make a most unjust and libelous attack on North Carolina; and though it has been met and triumphantly refuted by my distinguished friend and colleague in the Senate, (Mr. RANSOM,) in the course of his great and eloquent speech, yet I am unwilling to let it pass without notice and rebuke. In the course of this speech, remarkable for its reckless radicalism of assertion, in which he undertook the hopeless labor of bolstering up the fallen fortunes of republicanism, of apologizing for its profligacy, corruption, and gross and oft-repeated violations of the Constitution, and vainly essaying to stay the political flood-tide that is sweeping his party from power, he said:

The only reason why you have peace in North Carolina to-day is that we tried your Ku-Klux and sent them to the penitentiary, and Grant told you that you had to stop or he would make you do it; and you stopped through fear, not because you desired it.

Sir, this is not an attack upon a few lawless men but upon the people of my State, who are charged with the desire of committing crime but who are restrained by fear! There is not a respectable man in the State of any party who does not know this is a gross libel upon her people; not one.

A few men, as I have said, commit crimes, and sometimes under the greatest provocations, and because of this the people are charged with being influenced in their peaceful conduct not from any desire to keep the peace but through fear. Does this fancy-speaking, southern-hating, declamatory, and extremely radical Senator suppose he can make any of the better class of men in the North believe this of North Carolina? Would it not be well for him to nurse his passion and hate with less remorselessness, and cultivate the better feelings of his nature and the love of truth more?

The people of North Carolina afraid? Yes, they fear God and worship Him; they fear to do wrong, they fear to do anything that would dishonor them or tarnish the bright escutcheon of the State; and while they despise tyranny, corruption, and military despotism, they fear no man; they fear neither potentate nor President. They remember they are free citizens of a proud Commonwealth, a Commonwealth that first in the history of the earth, proclaimed to a listening world the Heaven-descended principles of civil and religious liberty, the right of self-government. And they do not fail to remember that State pride and a lofty patriotism will call together a hundred thousand of her brave sons and lovely daughters to liberty's shrine in old Mecklenburgh, to the mighty gathering to be presided over by Carolina's most honored son, Governor Graham, himself descended from gallant revolutionary sires, to celebrate the centennial of her "rebellion" and declaration of independence, thirteen and a half months before the grand national centennial at Philadelphia. And they remember that the first blood shed in the revolutionary war was poured out as a rich libation on the altar of liberty at the "Haw Fields," in the district I represent, nearly two years before the soil of Bunker Hill was enriched by the patriot blood of the glorious Warren and his compatriots. And they remember in that dark period "that tried men's souls" how their heroic ancestors poured forth in thousands to battle for liberty and freedom; and may I be pardoned for saying, since its memory is the proudest thought of my life, that among those brave soldiers there stood a grandfather who fought at Camden and the Cowpens, and fought and bled, and still fought, on the storm-swept and fire-girdled heights of King's Mountain?

Sir, those were men! and their thoughts and deeds are the rich heritages of their descendants. Does that Senator suppose that such a people, descended from such ancestry, know what craven fear is? If that Senator or other members have their passions so inflamed by sectional prejudice or political hate as to believe this, then their ignorance is as lamentable as their opinions are incorrect. Such is North Carolina and her people, past and present:

And though she envies not others their merited glory,
Say, whose name stands the foremost in liberty's story?

I have thus alluded to the historic record of greatness in the past that North Carolina has contributed to this nation and to the character and disposition of her people and their pacific condition and spirit at present, to refute the senseless charge and unjust aspersion that such a people can be influenced in their conduct and actions by fear.

The people of intelligence and thought everywhere are beginning to see that the main causes of all the disturbances in the South, now happily subsiding, are due and traceable to the utter failure of reconstruction and the oppression incident to it; for those disturbances have been the result of carpet-bag and negro rule—the sudden enfranchisement of the ignorant and the disfranchisement of the intelligent; the plunder of eleven States; the issuing and then stealing the bonds thereof, fixing upon the unrepresented property-holders of those States an aggregate debt of more than $150,000,000, and levying with remorseless oppression such burdensome and exorbitant taxes as to impoverish and ruin that section of the country. The oppressive and unconstitutional legislation of Congress in its unjust measures of reconstruction, seconded and supplemented by the corrupt and wildly-extravagant Legislatures of those States, all under the control of the republican party, drove the people of the South to the verge of poverty, ruin, and despair; and the wonder is that there have been no more disturbances, but on the other hand the exhibition of such patient submission and such sublime endurance and fortitude under such grinding, heartless, unparalleled oppression. I do not believe that such oppression and such endurance by a proud and brave people can be found in the annals of civilization.

To trace further the progress of reconstruction would be to write the iliad of the Constitution. It was offered to the southern people as a gift rich in promises of peace, harmony, and prosperity, but it has proved the wooden horse filled with armed men, who have pillaged, sacked, and plundered our country. It was smuggled into existence under the pretense of restoring and protecting life and property, but it has stalked through the South like the angel of death, alike destructive to human life and material wealth. It was proclaimed a necessity for the establishment of legal government in the late Confederate States, but it has in the name of law and order legalized theft, organized crime, and established anarchy. From it have sprung governors who have seized the scepter of power with unlineal hands; legislators who could lay no stronger claim to intelligence than the fact that they walked on two legs instead of four; judges who knew no more of law than to make it a cloak for bribery; ministerial officers whose assiduity was in the exact ratio of their own gain; and it has developed a higher capacity of man for cruelty toward his fellow-man than heathen or pagan has ever shown.

Thus I have given some of the fruits of reconstruction—an index at least to its volume of abuses. I have exaggerated nothing. I have told the truth—of the injustice, oppression, the impoverishment and almost ruin, of a brave, generous, gallant, noble people. I am one of those who have never despaired of our country and its free institutions. I could never believe that the great Ruler of the universe had in His providence brought our fathers to this New World and blest them and their children with the grand prospect of liberty and happiness, to have it destroyed before our Government had completed its hundredth year. I saw that we had passed through a civil war of gigantic proportions, and that evils of fearful magnitude beset us on all sides. I did not underrate the danger to republican institutions nor to the peace, security, and happiness of the South. But I knew that all countries of any age or size had been cursed with civil war. I had read how our great English ancestors had survived their civil conflicts, sometimes extending through half a century, and I always had faith that the genius and virtue of the American people would be equal to all the calamities and dangers that were around and before them. I rejoice that this hope has been just. The political sky is beginning to show there is a rift in the heavens that gives promise of the dawning sunlight of hope and prosperity. The dark clouds that have hung over us for these fifteen sad and angry years are beginning to break; the light is pouring through the dissolving darkness, and it requires no prophetic vision to foretell the speedy return of a bright and glorious day to our people. Our people have only to be patient, hopeful, peaceful a little longer, preparing with united resolve to use that potent and mighty weapon, the ballot—

A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod,
But executes the freeman's will
As lightning does the will of God!

Auspicious signs greet us from every portion of the Republic. Louisiana's chains will be broken, and the days of mourning of the southern people will soon be ended and give place to joy and happy gratulation. The virtue, the justice, the intelligence of the American people will assert their power, and the one hundredth year of the nation's independence will rise upon a free and delivered people from the Atlantic to the great Pacific seas. And, sir, among all the States of this grand Republic, from the oldest in New England to the youngest on the western prairies, not one will present to the eyes of the world a nobler history or brighter character than that unsullied old Commonwealth whose patriotic people set to Virginia and Massachusetts the example of American Independence, and who since the 20th of May, 1775, has maintained a name without reproach.

With these words, Mr. Speaker, I shall retire from this Hall, carrying with me the consciousness of having faithfully labored for the welfare and honor of the noble people who have so long trusted me; and although I have voluntarily declined further honors at their hands, I have lost none of my zeal and devotion to their rights and interests. I return to them with a heart full of gratitude for their unvarying support and inestimable kindness to me, and with fervent aspirations for their happiness and continued fidelity to constitutional liberty.

Opening the Mississippi—Make it the great Highway of Traffic and Transportation for the West and the Southwest.

SPEECH OF HON. BARBOUR LEWIS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 18, 1875.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4714) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River—

Mr. LEWIS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The importance of the measure before us cannot be exaggerated. Vast interests are dependent upon it. In the very highest sense the work proposed is truly national. It is nothing less than to open permanently a great natural highway to the sea, infinitely superior to all others, for the transportation, the trade, and the commerce of more than half the nation. In the magnitude and splendor and value of its far-reaching consequences it dwarfs all other public works proposed. It is pre-eminently the one great want, the one great measure of relief, needed by more than twenty millions of the American people. When completed, it would give an immense and incalculable impetus to agriculture, to commerce, to manufactures, to business and enterprise of all kinds for centuries to come. No right-minded man who comprehends the necessity and the vast beneficence of this great work of opening the mouth of the Mississippi, I think, will wish to hinder or oppose it.

TRUST THIS WORK TO ITS FRIENDS, NOT TO ITS ENEMIES.

The gentleman from Virginia thinks that it should be put into the hands of the officers of the Army Engineer Corps. I cannot agree with him. Many of them are opposed to it. It surely should not be placed in the hands of its enemies. It should remain in the hands of its friends, of men who are heartily and earnestly in its favor, who have faith in its merits and its practicability, and are devoted to its success zealously and untiringly. For some reason the distinguished Chief of the Corps of Army Engineers and many of his associates are strongly committed against this plan, though the great civil engineers of both Europe and America are warm in its favor. Would the gentleman on reflection deem it just to give the charge and control of this great national work to men who have written and battled against it with zeal and ability? They have fought against Eads with all their might, denounced his jettee system, and labored hard to demonstrate that it must be a failure. Are they the men to take hold of it now and carry it on to success? I would far sooner think of committing the care of the sick to a board of undertakers.

A CRUEL PROPOSITION.

It is a work which for consistency's sake they must and will continue to oppose and deride, I fear, to the last. It would in my judgment be most unwise to place this mighty task in the hands of men who have no faith in it, who have time and again pronounced it impracticable and staked their reputations upon proving it to be a folly and a failure. To place them in charge would be cruel even to them. With what heart or hope or energy could they carry on this great work knowing that its successful completion would prove themselves to have been false prophets and incompetent advisers? In such a case their very success would be ruinous to their own professional reputations. Does the gentleman wish to inflict such a misfortune upon his friends? He might as well bid them commit hari-kari at once!

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The gentleman from Tennessee certainly does not desire to do injustice to the engineer officers of the United States Army, when he knows that six of them out of seven on the last commission reported in favor of this jettee system.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman has for the moment forgotten, I suppose, that only three of the late commissioners were from the Army Engineer Corps, one from the Coast Survey, and three from civil life. I refer him to the words of the act, which have already been read this day, and which on that point are as follows:

SEC. 3. That a board of engineers, to be composed of three from the Army, one from the Coast Survey, and three from civil life, be appointed by the President; which said board shall make a survey of the mouth of the Mississippi River, with a view to determine the best method of obtaining and maintaining a depth of water sufficient for the purposes of commerce, either by a canal from said river to the waters of the Gulf or by deepening one or more of the natural outlets of said river; and said board shall make a full and detailed estimate and statement of the cost of each of said plans, and shall report the same, together with their opinion thereon, showing which of all said plans they deem preferable, giving their reasons therefor, to the Secretary of War, to be presented at the commencement of the second session of the Forty-third Congress; and that the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the cost of said survey.

And all this applies only to the last commission appointed by the President under the act passed by Congress last summer and which has made its report recently, after having visited the rivers and the great engineering works of Europe and having there learned by careful inspection that jettees are the only system now relied on in the Old World for opening great rivers to commerce.

GENERAL BARNARD AND OTHER GREAT ENGINEERS ALL RIGHT.

I know well, sir, that General Barnard and a very few other eminent and gifted men of the Army Engineer Corps are and have been favorable to the jettee system; but last year when an official report was made by a former able board of Army engineers and sent to this House by the Secretary of War, we found that the very able and distinguished senior officer of that board, its president, General Barnard, stood alone in his opinion that a mere canal was utterly insufficient and unworthy of the great object sought, and that the mouth of the Mississippi River should, by every consideration of fitness, of justice, and of propriety, be opened to the commerce of the world by a grand system of jettees. All the other members of the board unfortunately favored a mere canal, (which would itself be little better than an obstruction to commerce,) and strongly and decidedly disapproved of the proposed opening the great river to the sea by jettee constructions. They were very positive in their opposition, and their official chief, the head of the Army Engineer Corps, strenuously supported their views and fought the jettee system as proposed to be applied to the Mississippi with all his might.

EADS AND DE WITT CLINTON.

I wish, sir, to see this work placed in the hands not of its enemies, who have derided and denounced it, but of the great civil engineer who had the intellect and the sagacity to conceive and mature this grand undertaking. It is a national work of the very highest importance. It should be pushed forward to completion wisely, efficiently, and speedily by the master mind that invented and planned the great work, by the man whose heart and life and fame for the future are in it. As the name of De Witt Clinton will forever be proudly associated with the Erie Canal, so will that of James B. Eads with the opening and perfecting the Mississippi River as the grand imperial highway of American commerce. Old fogyism would not accomplish the work in half a century. Men of routine, of delay, of procrastination, of red-tape formulas, are too slow for such achievements. The work demands a man of the highest eminence in his profession. He must be a man of genius, of great talent, alive to his work, a man of deeds, not words.

WHAT CIVIL ENGINEERS HAVE DONE.

It was so in the great improvements of the rivers of Europe. It was the gifted minds of great civil engineers like Sir Charles Hartley, not army engineers, whose promotion and rise in the world depend merely upon seniority, but men trained to high attainments, grand ideas, and vast conceptions, amid the toilsome labors, the sharp rivalries, the ceaseless competitions, and the inspiring ambitions of civil life; men who carve their own future and hew their own pathway in life by the tireless energy of their brains and hands; such were the men who conceived the wonderful improvements by dikes and jettees that have changed the whole face of Europe so far as her river systems of commerce are concerned. Such men, too, were the authors and creators of all her great structures that cover her lands and throng her seas.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman name the men of genius he would substitute for the old fogies, that I may have them put in my amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. I cannot yield to the gentleman, because with all his great ability he is a little crazy on that subject. He has offered an amendment the result of which, though not so designed by him, would be to kill it, or at least greatly to impair its value and cripple its usefulness. This great work cannot and must not be fettered in the way he proposes. Let us have a fair square thing of it. Adopt his amendment, and the work would be inspected to death by its sworn enemies. They have been the very prophets and apostles of despair ever since it was projected. To appoint them as its judges would be but to commission its executioners.

MODERN ENGINEERING FAVORS JETTEES, AND HAS TRIED THEM THOROUGHLY.

Nor can I agree with another gentleman, who has said he will vote for the bill but is opposed to jettees, and regards them merely as experiments. The experience of the great engineering works of Europe has settled the question. During the last twenty-five years not a river has been improved there and opened to the sea except by jettees saving the case of the Rhone, which was improved after a fashion by a canal, and the engineer in charge of that work indignantly declared that it was a big land speculation. In other words, the best course, the honest one, the right one, was not adopted. Short and imperfect jettees, not extending as far as the bar but stopping nearly a mile short of its crest, were tried, and for many years gave an open highway to the sea broad and deep and ample for all purposes; but as the jettees were not carried out to the bar, nor within nearly a mile of it, in the course of time the bar formed farther out again, and then some rings of land sharks, speculators, who cared nothing for the wants of commerce or aught else but to fill their own pockets, formed a ring, as Tweed and others have sometimes done in our own country, and contrived for purposes of plunder to have a canal job, instead of an open river, a broad, free highway to the sea for the ships of all nations. Had the jettees in the first place been extended out to the crest of the bar, as Hartley and the great engineers of England, France, Holland, Italy, and Germany said they should, the river would have remained open for centuries.

IMMENSE INTERESTS DEMAND AN OPEN RIVER TO THE SEA.

Sir, the business and trade and commerce of the immense valley of the Mississippi, with its twenty-one States and eight or ten Territories; its twenty millions of people now living upon its soil, and its hundreds and thousands of millions that will dwell upon it hereafter; its thousand million bushels of grain produced every year, and which amount, vast as it is, will be doubled in ten or fifteen years and in half a century will swell to at least five billion bushels of annual production; its three million bales of cotton, soon to become five and in time ten millions; its hemp, tobacco, and sugar; its pork and beef and dairy products; its mining, manufacturing, and mechanical industries; its one million and a quarter square miles of the most fertile soil on the globe; its thirty thousand miles of steamboat navigation; its myriads of cities, towns, and villages, and millions of farms and plantations—all these proclaim in million tones that cannot be mistaken the absolute and indispensable demand for an open outlet to the sea. The interests which require it are immense beyond the power of computation. It is strange that they have endured the want of it so patiently and so long. Here is the noblest river on the globe, with its thousands of tributaries draining vast realms, the fairest, richest lands beneath the sun, bearing upon its bosom an internal commerce of more than $1,800,000,000 in a year, and fitted by nature to bear a commerce greater than the whole world possesses to-day, shut out from the ocean and the outer world, to a disastrous extent, by a miserable mud bar! Similar obstacles in great rivers in other countries have been easily removed by jettees, and there is every reason to believe that they can be here.

A GRAND OPPORTUNITY.

A great civil engineer with a grand and successful record in his profession, standing among the foremost in the world, comes and asks the nation for authority to do the work at his own expense, and to be repaid only half what some of our great Army engineers have estimated it must cost when it shall have stood the test of time, shall have permanently deepened the river at its mouth, and given it a broad and open entrance up which the fleets and navies of the world could sail and steam as easily and safely as in the open sea. He assumes all risks, bears all the cost and hazard, and is not to be paid a dollar until his work shall have proved itself to be all that is wanted, and shall stand a perfect and magnificent success! Could anything be fairer? Could a nation desire higher guarantees? The country risks nothing by this course and gains everything. In a few years the work will be done, and immense ocean steamers drawing thirty feet of water and carrying each from five or six to eight, or even ten thousand tons of freight, if need be, can enter the great river by hundreds and navigate its waters and pass and repass each other with abundance of room and far more safety than they have to-day in the British Channel and the Straits of Dover!

MAKE THE WHOLE RIVER AND ITS GREAT TRIBUTARIES ALL NAVIGABLE!

When all this shall have been accomplished, the duty and problem of the hour and of the age will be to improve and perfect the navigation of the Mississippi River and its great branches, and also to guide and restrain its waters from overflow. These things can also be done. It is within the power of science and engineering skill and labor to control the river, to give its waters some uniformity of width and of depth, to straighten its channel somewhat, to deepen it where shoal by confining its current by means of dikes and jettees and otherwise within narrower limits, and thus compelling it to wash out its bed to a greater depth, until in the course of years the river shall be made navigable up to Memphis, if not to Cairo and Saint Louis, for the largest ocean steamers, and there shall be on the Mississippi and Missouri and their great branches at least ten thousand miles of safe and perfect navigation for the largest class of river steamboats and ten or twenty thousand more for smaller river boats.

WATER TRANSPORTATION CHEAPEST AND BEST.

When all this shall have been achieved, as it assuredly must and will be, the great problem of cheap transportation for all the countless products of the vast valley of the Mississippi and Missouri, an immense and mighty empire by itself alone, will be solved thoroughly and completely as nature meant it should. No other transportation can ever possibly compete with that by water. For bulky products and for long distances it is at least four or five fold cheaper than any other.

As an illustration of the vast reach and extent of navigation on the Mississippi and its branches I may mention that a few days ago a permit was granted in the Treasury Department for a steamboat to ship a lot of coal-oil or petroleum at Pittsburgh and transport it down the Ohio and up the Mississippi and Missouri to Fort Benton, a voyage of forty-two hundred miles. If that boat shall return her single trip will be eighty-four hundred miles.

The farmers and planters of the West and South have suffered long under the grievous burdens of costly transportation. The railroads of the country, immensely important and valuable as they are, cannot furnish the relief so urgently demanded.

RAILROADS THE MIRACLES OF THE CENTURY.

They have done wonders. They have enormously increased the wealth and prosperity of the nation. They have built up the mighty West as it were by magic, transforming its rude and savage wildernesses into fruitful fields, thriving towns, and populous cities, until the former haunts of the buffalo, the wolf, and the Indian have become the smiling home of a magnificent civilization. They have crossed the continent and scaled the lofty mountains hoary with their eternal snows. They have joined together the Atlantic and the Pacific by bars of steel, and have linked the great lakes of the North to the Gulf of Mexico on the south by ties that shall form an imperishable union so long as wisdom and patriotism shall endure in our land. Their increase and extension have been truly amazing. In a single generation they have sprung into being, grown into giants, and flung their teeming net-work of railways alive with traffic all over the immense area of our nation. Within the last twenty years 55,000 miles of railroad have been built in the United States, which is only less by 10,000 miles than all the rest of the world has built in the same time. The construction and equipment of our railroads in that time has cost about $4,600,000,000; those of other lands, $5,450,000,000. In 1830 we had 23 miles only of railroads; in 1840, 2,318 miles; in 1850, 9,021 miles; and in 1860, 30,635. We have to-day 70,650 miles of operating railroads, and still the cry is "Give us more!" In the last five years preceding 1874, 28,396 miles were built. The world has never before witnessed an immense development of vast material resources so rapid and so marvelous. If the advance during the next quarter of a century could go on at the rate it has during the last twenty-five years, the year 1901 would behold our country covered with 800,000 miles of railroads traversing nearly every county in every State.

THE UNITED STATES ALWAYS AHEAD—RAILROAD KINGS.

Our system is the most extensive on the globe. Soon we will have more miles of iron and steel rails than all the rest of the world. Our locomotives are better than any others, and have been sought for and purchased largely for the roads of other nations, both of the Old World and the New. Even our passenger cars, parlor and sleeping cars, are being adopted throughout Europe as a decided improvement. The brains and the sharpest intellect of our country, its master-minds in business and money, are the chiefs and managers of our railroads. Scott and Garrett and Vanderbilt and a few lesser magnates, clear-sighted and cool-headed, gifted and indomitable men, are the real monarchs of our western world. They are a tremendous force and power in the material interests, the economies, and the wealth-production of the nation. Not a single passenger travels over our land, not a pound of freight is moved, not a bale of cotton or a bushel of grain is transported far by land, not even an ounce of mail matter, a letter, or a newspaper is borne from State to State or city to hamlet but by their permission and under their control.

REVENUES AND POWER OF OUR RAILROADS.

The gross receipts of all our railroads in 1871 were $403,329,208; in 1872, $465,241,055; and in 1873, $526,419,935. Their net earnings were in 1871 $141,746,404; in 1872, $165,754,373; and in 1873, $183,810,562.

The combined railroad interests of our country form a mighty power, far-reaching, wide-spreading, ramifying everywhere, affecting every citizen, ubiquitous, enormous. It has modified and almost transformed our modern civilization. It is a tremendous factor in war as well as in peace. Armies and all their death-dealing agencies of destruction are transported by it as readily as the most useful and beneficent products of industry and commerce.

RAILROADS COMPARED WITH CANALS, ETC.

And yet immense and manifold as is the power of our railroads, vast as is their carrying capacity, they can never compete with lake and river transportation. With canals, however, they are most formidable competitors. The Erie Canal, that in 1862 carried 84 per cent. of the grain sent East from the great lakes, now only carries 35 per cent. The New York canals in 1861 moved 2,500,000 tons of agricultural products, while the three great railroads only carried 900,000 tons. In 1872 the canals transported only 1,683,962 tons, while the railroads transported 3,670,614 tons. The Erie Canal, that once controlled and monopolized transportation between the lakes and the seaboard, has in a great measure lost its power. It still has a prodigious value, and the use of steam on its waters may hereafter greatly increase its usefulness. But at present it has become dwarfed and almost insignificant compared with its giant rivals, the New York Central, the Erie, and the Pennsylvania Railroads.

Between 1869 and 1871 the amount of freight moved one mile decreased 14,802,039 tons on the canals of New York, and increased on the Erie and Central Railroads 375,701,579 tons moved one mile. The New York Central, in 1871, moved 880,327,865 tons one mile at 1.65 cents per ton per mile; the Erie Railroad moved 897,446,728 tons one mile at 1.47 cents per ton per mile. The New York canals moved 1,050,104,125 tons one mile at 1.02 cents per ton per mile. The tariff on wheat was 3 mills per ton per mile, showing very clearly that while the water rate is the lowest, the canals have not the capacity to move the surplus products of the West, and the railroads beat them in close competition at this low rate. The Welland Canal, in 1872, carried 625,891 tons of vegetable food. The total tons of vegetable food moved from the lakes by all the canals in 1872 was 2,309,853, and the total tons moved by the Central, Erie, and Pennsylvania Railroads 2,770,614. There is no hope of any further reduction from competition with these canals from the lakes.

The Pennsylvania Railroad in 1873 transported 9,211,231 tons of freight. Its gross earnings were nearly twenty-five million dollars, ($24,886,006.) The railroads are even gaining rapidly upon the lakes in regard to their respective agencies in transportation. From Chicago, the largest shipping point on the lakes, where the railroads converge that gather the grain from the Northwest for shipment East, only 2 per cent. was shipped East by rail in 1862, but in 1872 22 per cent.

CHICAGO AND SAINT LOUIS VS. NEW ORLEANS.

The great, rapidly-growing cities of the West, such as Chicago, Saint Louis, and many others, have of late years been mainly built up by railroads. The chief reason for the decline of New Orleans for many years has been that the railroads tap the Mississippi River at so many points and divert eastward commerce that formerly used to go by the river to New Orleans. This process commenced even before the war.

MEMPHIS THE CENTRAL POINT OF THE CONTINENT FOR COTTON AND FOR RAILROADS.

In this way, by virtue of her railroads largely, Memphis has become one of the greatest and best cotton markets in America. She is in the very center of the best natural route for a transcontinental railroad from ocean to ocean, and I cannot believe that her great advantages in that respect can possibly be forgotten or overlooked by railroad men and capitalists or by Congress and the nation. A route passing through Memphis would give the shortest and most direct communication between Europe and Asia. It would be free from all the dangers of snow-drifts and blockades which in the winter months obstruct and delay travel on the northern routes, and it would also escape the pestilential miasms and malaria of more southern routes. Midway between the Atlantic and the Pacific, with a wide-awake and intelligent people, with vast natural advantages of every kind, as favorably situated for the great commerce of the world on the Mississippi as London is on the Thames, it is also on the shortest, healthiest, and speediest route for travel across the continent.

Ere long the six hundred millions of people in Asia (soon to be one thousand millions) and the four hundred millions of Europe will alike look to Memphis as the stopping place and center of communication between them. Their immense trade and traffic will all pass through it. Its amount will be vast beyond all conception. The Mississippi will then of course be open to the commerce of the world. Not only will its mouth have been opened by Eads with his jettees so that ships can sail in by the hundreds in a day, but the great river will have been improved and perfected by engineering skill, so that the greatest ocean steamers will come with ease every day in the year right up to the wharves of Memphis. That city will then proudly stand at the head of ocean-steamer navigation on the Mississippi, and at the same time in the center of the line of the grandest railroads on earth. Her position will be the finest in the world—central, commanding, and imperial. She will have direct railroad communications to every point of the compass. The eyes of the world will be turned admiringly upon her, and she will prove worthy of her great destiny.

RAILROADS SHOULD BE TRIBUTARY TO THE RIVER, AND NOT HOSTILE.

Whenever the navigation of the Mississippi and its great tributaries shall be perfected and made what it ought to be, the railroads of the West and the South will become tributaries to the mighty river. Now they are the despots of traffic, and the river is tributary to them. Nature's own best and cheapest and most perfect system of transportation is degraded to be the slave of the dear and the artificial. This system is utterly unnatural and ruinous. It is absurd and shocking. The productions of the soil cannot possibly pay the high rates for freight which the railroads are compelled to charge where they carry it long distances. The roads will soon have all they can do, and in time will earn all they can desire, with other classes of traffic. In less than ten years their annual receipts will be more than one thousand million dollars. Had it not been for the panic, at the rate they went on from 1867 to 1872 they would have reached that sum in 1881. In those five years 28,350 miles of roads were constructed.

GREAT RESULTS SURE TO FOLLOW A PERFECTED RIVER NAVIGATION.

If the steamboat interests of the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, the Arkansas, the Red, and White Rivers, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and other great tributaries of the mighty "Father of Waters" could only have a similar revival and growth and development by making the navigation of those rivers as perfect as it ought to be made, how wonderful would be the transformation on our western and southern waters! How magical, how inspiring and astounding would be the new life and new hopes that would waken up every branch of business and every pursuit of honest industry! It would be startling and striking as the resurrection of the dead. But once open the mouths of the Mississippi completely and thoroughly, and then with wise and daring enterprise improve and perfect the navigation of that wonderful and magnificent river, deepening and broadening its channel at the few points where even that will be needed, until ocean steamers can always come to Memphis, improving elsewhere for steamboats of lighter draught, and in a few years you would behold just this tremendous development. Business would awake, buried enterprise would come forth alive and earnest, the magic hum of industry and labor would thrill the air, hope would revive, confidence would take the place of fear, distrust, and anxiety. Men would have new courage and new energy; our fields would be tilled as never before; the workshops of the South would be thronged with artisans; manufactures would be created; labor and skill and capital would all go forth to new fields of effort, there to reap their rich rewards. On land all would be life and energy, industry and hope, and our great rivers would be all alive with fleets of steamers bearing the commerce, the trade, and the traffic of the immense valley of the Mississippi. A new world of business would spring into being. It is to effect this, sir, that I labor, and sooner or later it will all be realized.

DIRECT TRADE—VAST ECONOMIES—BETTER PRICES FOR THE PLANTER.

It would bring a direct trade with Europe and with Asia also to the banks of the Mississippi. It would give our farmers and planters higher prices for all they raise, for they would then send it direct to the consumers in the Old World. Now all the productions of the South and West have to endure the burdens of a land carriage from one to two thousand miles before they are placed on shipboard for transportation to foreign ports. They are handled by dozens of middle-men, all of whom must make their profits out of the unfortunate planter. It is sometimes a wonder that anything should be left for the hapless producer.

Again, all his supplies that come from foreign lands—his sugar, his coffee, and his tea, with a thousand other articles of comfort or of necessity—come to him by the same roundabout and expensive course, and burdened by as many exactions and needless profits to others as were heaped upon his own products in the process of sending them abroad. He gets but half a price for what he sells, he pays two or three prices for what he buys. If the people of the Mississippi Valley could ship their products direct from their own shores to Europe they would get more for them by all the great savings in freight and by the fact that no swarms of middle-men would as now handle them and make enormous profits out of them. They would ship and sell direct to their customers abroad, and both parties would be greatly benefited by the change. Then whatever they bought of foreign products would also come to them direct, without transshipment, without long and expensive land carriage, without being handled by importers and jobbers and speculators and other middle-men in New York and elsewhere by the score till prices are doubled and trebled. Fifty million dollars would thus be saved to the people of the valley and added to their income every year. In twenty years this would make a gain of $1,000,000,000, but if put at interest as it accrued it would in that time amount to more than $2,000,000,000, and would equal the enormous sum total of our present national debt! But under the grand inspiring effect upon business and enterprise of every kind that would follow in the valley of the Mississippi the opening of the great river to the commerce of the world values of everything would rise. Land, now so cheap in the West and South, would soon bring twice or thrice its price of to-day, and in less than twenty years the Mississippi Valley alone would be worth twice as much as the whole United States is at the present time!

NO MORE DELAY—CANAL PROJECTS ARE BUT DREAMS OF FOLLY.

In the face of such vast results, which beckon to us from the future and bid us onward, longer delay cannot be tolerated, inaction cannot and must not be endured. To talk of a canal at the mouth of the Mississippi is absurd and childish. Vastly expensive, unreliable, and uncertain, it would be utterly insufficient for the immense commerce of coming years. Where at its very best the sleepy, poking canal could pass one vessel at a time, hundreds could sail and steam in and up through the open mouth of the river. Through that a thousand could pass up to New Orleans and to Memphis, while a pitiful half dozen could be dragged and snaked through a mere dull ditch of a canal. There is humiliation and degradation in the very idea of a miserable canal as the termination and outlet of the most magnificent river on the globe. In future years the men who have been so loud and blatant for a canal to begin anywhere and end nowhere will be making affidavits that they never heard of any canal, that they always fought and denounced it as the muddiest and windiest of absurdities, that they defeated and killed it! They will claim to be the authors and fathers of jettees, and will apply for a patent upon Eads himself as their invention and their creation!

THE SOUTH PASS VS. THE SOUTHWEST—NO COMPARISON.

The advocates of canals, overthrown and defeated in their schemes, now favor the narrow South Pass, with a width in places of only 500 to 538 feet, instead of the great Southwest Pass, where Eads stands ready to give a channel 2,000 feet wide and 50 feet deep for all time to come. They and others say it will be cheaper by a few millions, as if that argument of a narrow-minded economy were to be conclusive in a great national work that is to endure for centuries and to be worth to our country thousands of millions of dollars. I care but little, sir, which shall be taken and opened now. The day will come when the nation will have both opened. Either one will do now; but it is our right to have the best. Everybody knows that, aside from a somewhat increased expense, all the facts are in favor of the great Southwest Pass. The water on its bar is now more than twice as deep as it is in the South Pass, where it is only seven feet. It can be deepened more easily and with greater certainty. It would be not only vastly deeper, but in addition four times as wide. It would give a magnificent entrance from the sea that would be the admiration of mankind. It would be truly worthy of our nation.

THE FUTURE WILL CORRECT THE MISTAKE OF TO-DAY.

But if parsimony is to rule; if broad, grand views of statesmanship are to be ignored, and if narrow-minded and contracted ideas are still to prevail, give us the South Pass. For twenty years or more it may answer very well, and then the expanding commerce of the great West and Southwest will demand all that I have advocated and will be contented with nothing less. Those sections will then be the mighty controlling power of the nation, and when acting together will be irresistible. They will possess two-thirds of the population and wealth of our country. No power on earth can then say to them, "Thus far and no farther." From their determination there will be no appeal. Their united wishes and demands will be as inevitable and irreversible as the decrees of fate. They will only need to be awakened to a clear perception of their joint interests. When they shall take hold of the work in earnest it will be done, and they will see to it that it is well done, thoroughly and completely, as it ought.

THIS GREAT WORK NOT SECTIONAL, BUT TRULY NATIONAL.

Mr. Speaker, for years I have advocated and labored for this great measure, not only because it is of unspeakable importance and value to my own constituents,) and their interests are very dear to me, as they ought to be, but because it is also essential in the highest degree to the welfare,) the prosperity, and the happiness of the whole country. No blight can fall upon one portion of our nation but its enfeebling and paralyzing consequences sooner or later shall be felt by all. Cripple the energies or retard the living development of any one great section of our common country and all must suffer. The burning of half of Chicago years ago gave a shock to the business of New York, of Boston, and the whole of the great North and East. The awful overflows and disastrous floods of the Mississippi, like the fearful freshets of northern and western rivers, not only carry desolation and ruin in their pathway for the localities where they occur, but the injuries they inflict extend far more widely and cause distress over vast areas of our land. The fearful epidemics which sometimes prevail in our southern cities cause mourning all over our country from Maine to California. But in a far greater degree anything which fetters the business and industry and enterprise of the immense region known as the vast valley of the Mississippi, which in great degree locks it up from the outer world, isolates and confines it, and almost annihilates its commerce, as does the great bar at the mouth of the one great river of our country, is a huge barrier and obstruction to the best and freest development of our whole country. It is a heavy incubus and monstrous burden upon the growth and progress of our nation. Our whole land is poorer and weaker because of it. Every American citizen is humiliated by the fact. It is a national disgrace and reproach. The entire nation is vitally interested in its speedy removal.

My constituents are a generous and high-minded people. They ask for themselves only the same rights and the same fostering care from the National Government which they are ever ready to concede to others. They desire the prosperity alike of all sections of our common country. This measure, when fully carried out as I have always advocated it, will be a great boon to them. It will quicken all their industries into new life, give them direct trade with Europe, will bring them immigration and wealth, and transform their gloomy past and present into a radiant and hopeful future, but their good will also be a vast benefit and a blessing to the entire American people.

WILL FORM A MORE PERFECT UNION.

It will promote unity of sentiment, harmony of feeling, and community of interests. It will deeply gratify the people of the South and West. It will give prosperity, and that will bring content. Men will bless the Government that makes them prosperous and happy. It is not in human nature to be grateful for adversity. Men will repine at misfortune, even if sent by Heaven. But a great measure of wise and just relief like this, which lifts them out of the mire of despondency and doubles their powers and their opportunities to help themselves and build up once more their broken and shattered fortunes, will be hailed by them with joy and gladness. Too long have they gloomily "sat upon the rough and ragged edge of despair."

Pass this bill, and in future years perfect the navigation of their great rivers, and protect the shores of the Lower Mississippi from the desolating floods, and you will by so doing give hope and courage to millions, you will strengthen the Union, and bind together the hearts of all its citizens. The people of my own State, of patriotic Tennessee, will hail such generous action with joyous acclamation. Their interests are especially involved because of their three great rivers, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and the Mississippi. If those three rivers were all properly improved and rendered thoroughly navigable at all times, Tennessee, with her grand central position, her fertile soil, her wealth of timber, her rich mines, and genial climate would be the most favored State in the Union. With a noble history as she has in the past, her future would be glorious and inspiring. Her brave, spirited, and true-hearted sons from her mountains to the Mississippi are in favor of this measure to a man. It is the beginning of a new and brighter era of greatly-needed internal improvements. The good of the country demands it. It is expedient, it is right, it is absolutely necessary to be done.

Indian Depredation Claims.

SPEECH OF HON R. C. McCORMICK,

OF ARIZONA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1875.

The House having met as in Committee of the Whole for general debate—

Mr. McCORMICK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At the last session of Congress I introduced and the House passed (after reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs) on April 30, 1874, the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the House a list of all the claims for losses through depredations committed by Indians, presented to the Department of the Interior for ten years past, giving in each case the date when and the place where the depredations were committed, the date of the presentation of the claim, the name of the claimant or claimants, and the full amount of the claim; also, the name of the tribe or band of Indians charged with the depredations, and the action of the Department upon each claim, and also the damage done by whites to Indians.

Or to be strictly accurate I should say that I proposed so much of the resolution as called for a list with particulars of the claims for losses through depredations by Indians, and that the additional words, to which I made no objection, were added by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] who loses no opportunity, here or elsewhere, to bring the whites under tribute to the Indians if by any showing he can possibly do so.

In response to the resolution the Interior Department sent to the House, on the 9th of January last, a list of the claims referred to "as reported to that Department by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs," and it has been printed as House Executive Document No. 65, second session Forty-third Congress.

To this pamphlet of sixty pages, and the facts it discloses, I take this occasion to call the attention of the House, and I shall be brief although the subject is one of large importance and upon which much might and should be said.

The pamphlet gives a list of six hundred and fifty claims presented within the ten years named, and amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $9,012,379.74. Of this sum the amount of $4,700,179.30 is made up of claims received at the Department of the Interior from the auditor of the State of Kansas, the same having been examined by a committee appointed for that purpose under the provision of an act of the Legislature approved March 3, 1869.

Numerous claims filed before and since that period would if added swell this amount to larger proportions, but this list is all-sufficient to show that it is high time Congress met the question of the payment of Indian depredation losses squarely and fairly and forever disposed of it in one way or another.

As it now is, hundreds of persons in the border States and Territories are kept in suspense through the blind, if not absolutely deceptive, legislation of Congress upon the subject.

A review of this legislation shows that as far back as 1802 our ancestors provided means of indemnity for spoliations committed by such Indians as were "in amity with the United States." This liability and promise to indemnify continued as a part of the law of the land up to 1859, when the promise, but not the liability according to the judgment of lawyers who have given the matter much study, among whom I may cite my friend the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. COMINGO,] was revoked by act of Congress.

That gentleman in a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which I shall further refer, says:

The liability did not depend upon, nor was it created by, the promise. It existed independent of the latter—the latter being a simple recognition of the former; and the liability has not yet been ignored, but, to the contrary, has been recognized in all subsequent legislation on the subject, although the express promise of indemnity has been recalled.

The trade and intercourse act of 1834 repeals that of 1802, but by the seventeenth section of said act provisions are made for full indemnity and the same is guaranteed by the Government. This statute remained in force from June 30, 1834, to February 28, 1859, when it was repealed, the repealing clause being as follows:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities as prescribed in said act. (11 Statutes at Large, page 401, section 8.)

This left in force all of said act excepting the clause that guaranteed indemnity out of the Treasury.

In the Indian appropriation bill approved July 15, 1870, this section was incorporated:

SEC. 4. That no part of the moneys appropriated by this act, or which may hereafter be appropriated in any general act or deficiency bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, to pay annuities due to or to be used and expended for the care and benefit of any tribe or tribes of Indians named herein, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for depredations that may have been or that may be committed by said tribe or tribes, or any member or members thereof; and no claims for Indian depredations shall hereafter be paid until Congress shall make special appropriations therefor; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

This provision was urged on the plea that it was necessary in order to protect the tribes against fraudulent demands upon their annuities, but it was not shown that there had been any number of such, and so emphatic was the protest of those who believed that it removed one of the strongest inducements to the Indians to keep the peace that it was with difficulty that it became a part of the law. Following it several attempts were made in the House, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made an earnest effort in the Senate to obtain the appointment of a commission to sit at different points in the Western States and Territories, to receive, examine, and report to Congress for consideration all well-established claims for losses through Indian depredations. Finally, by the seventh section of the act of Congress making appropriations for the Indian service, approved May 29, 1872, it was enacted:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to prepare and cause to be published such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper, prescribing the manner of presenting claims arising under existing laws or treaty stipulations, for compensation for depredations committed by the Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support such claims; he shall carefully investigate all such claims as may be presented, subject to the rules and regulations prepared by him, and report to Congress, at each session thereof, the nature, character, and amount of such claims, whether allowed by him or not, and the evidence upon which his action was based: Provided, That no payment on account of said claim shall be made without a specific appropriation by Congress.

Under this law the Secretary promptly prepared and published a series of definite rules and regulations under which claimants for losses both by treaty and wild Indians have been acting to this time, and the larger part of the claims enumerated in Executive Document No. 65 have been sent by him to Congress. Persons who have been sufferers at the hands of the Indians have supposed, and very naturally I think, that by this law and these regulations Congress admitted a certain liability, and would be disposed to recognize and pay any claims certified to be reasonable and authenticated, certainly any against Indians with whom the Government has treaty stipulations or to whom it has been paying annuities.

I know that the examination of the claims has been thorough and rigid and that only such have been recommended to Congress for payment as have stood the most critical investigation by the Indian Office and Interior Department, the officers of which, so far as I have observed, like those of other Departments, give the Government the benefit of every doubt and look upon all claimants with more or less of suspicion and distrust.

I know moreover, from residence in the Indian country, that many of the claims are for losses sustained under circumstances the most aggravating and distressing, and for which the claimants are no more responsible than the members of the peace commission or the Society of Friends. But as it is not my purpose to appeal to the sympathy of the House, but rather to its sense of justice, I will not attempt even an outline of the work of plunder, destruction, and death so boldly and successfully carried on upon the frontier by the foe of the pioneer settler and the enemy of our advancing civilization.

In the report heretofore referred to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. COMINGO,] of the Committee on Indian Affairs, (report No. 780, first session Forty-third Congress, claim of John Fletcher,) in the following language sustains the common supposition regarding the act of May 29, 1872, namely:

> Provisions are thus made for ascertaining the extent of injuries that may be inflicted on citizens of the United States; the result of these injuries we call claims, and we provide that they may be paid out of our general treasury, and that they shall not be paid out of the annuities due or to become due the Indians. If we do not thereby recognize a right on the part of those who suffer from the depredations of these people to recover the actual damages they may sustain, what is the meaning and effect of all this legislation? Why do we forbid the injured to redress their own grievances? and why lock up the annuities of those who despoil our citizens, and hold out a pretended promise of payment?

And further—

> Congress may make appropriations to pay these losses. This is plain. But it is insisted by some that there is no legal liability to pay them. If this be true, when did the liability cease? Why have we continued to pay some of these claims, and why make provisions for prosecuting them in the manner in which we have done? and why do we provide for paying them out of the Treasury? If they are not valid claims, by what authority can we appropriate money out of the Treasury to pay them? The right of recovery depends, in each case, on the particular facts that bear upon it. In this respect it does not differ from the right of recovery in any civil action, such as assumpsit, covenant, or trespass.

But the minority of the committee, headed by the active apologist for the redskin, from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] (report 780, part 2,) dissent from these conclusions; and that the House and the citizens of the frontier may know the precise grounds upon which they deny the general liability of the Government for depredations by Indians, in any case or class of cases, unless so made by positive act of Congress, I quote their reasons at length:

> 1. That the courts have not held that the Government was liable for such damages in any adjudicated case before the courts of the United States, except under act of Congress declaring such liability.
> 2. Prior to the act of March 30, 1802, (see 2 Statutes at Large, 143,) during the entire history of the country, colonial and federative, there was no such liability recognized or claimed by courts or officials of the United States or of any State. The statute of that date (March 30, 1802) was the first recognition of liability by the Government in such cases, and was specially in aid and encouragement of frontier settlements contending against the then numerous and powerful tribes in possession of the then extended frontier. It was a voluntary liability of the Government, under a statute, for the especial benefit of a class of citizens undertaking special enterprises and undergoing peculiar hardships and dangers then existing.
> 3. This permitted liability was redeclared by the act of June 30, 1834, (see 4 Statutes at Large, 734.) This last act neither enlarged nor diminished the liability of the Government to the frontier settlers, the original reason for the concession still existing in 1834 as in 1802.
> 4. The increased number of the white people and the strength of their Government, the comparative diminished strength and numbers of Indian tribes and people, and also the numerous, fradulent, gross, and exorbitant claims against the Government, traveling over this road to the doors of the Treasury, through the nation's generosity, were sufficient causes for the act of February 28, 1859, repealing the provisions of the act of 1834, and declaring affirmatively that the Government would not be liable for such losses thereafter.
> 5. The act of 1834, making Indian tribes liable out of their annuities for the acts of individuals of the tribe, remained in force until, from the injustice and abuse of the remedy by claimants, that provision was repealed.
> 6. There has been no recognized liability of the Government since February 28, 1859, except by special statute providing for the allowance and payment of claims for Indian depredations.
> 7. The act of May 29, 1872, does not contain any part of the spirit or statutory liability of those referred to from 1802 to 1859. The provision of said act is for a hearing, upon evidence, as to the merits of each case, and prohibiting payment, without the future voluntary assumption of liability by an appropriation by Congress.
> Thus sustaining these views: That there is no liability of the Government beyond that voluntarily assumed by law, and which may be withdrawn at pleasure; that it was originally assumed and continued to aid and encourage settlements in the face of the Indians who were likely to commit depredations; that, having served its purpose, it was repealed as unnecessary, and to abate the corruption and injustice practiced by unworthy claimants under it; that it required, under its voluntary liability, that the tribe or members committing depredations to be redressed should be at amity with the United States.
> And finally, if the relation and liability, as in the case of guardian and ward, or of special control over the Indian, or guarantee for his conduct, exists against the United States, then all claims, including war claims, irrespective of condition of amity, would attach, and the liability and losses of the Government would be illimitable.

This is, I think, the clearest and most complete statement yet put forth by those who oppose the payment of the claims which now, under law, the Secretary of the Interior is constantly sending to the House.

It may however very properly be supplemented by the following report submitted to the Senate May 4, 1874, by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Indian Affairs:

> The proposition submitted by the resolution of the Senate is whether an obligation rests upon the Government of the United States to reimburse States and Territories, and the citizens thereof, for expenses and damages sustained by reason of incursions of hostile Indians.
> The committee are not able to perceive upon what grounds such obligation can be supposed to arise.
> Most certainly such obligation is not assumed when the States enter the Union. Nor is it believed that it necessarily results from their relation to it when so admitted.
> Doubtless an obligation to reimburse expenses incurred in resisting an invasion of the public enemy might arise if duly called upon under circumstances justifying such call for aid. But it is sufficient to say that no such question arises upon the proposition submitted, namely, an incursion of hostile Indians.
> It is scarcely to be presumed that the public safety would become so largely involved by the incursion of marauding parties of Indians as to render it necessary for the State to appeal to the United States Government for aid to defend its soil, or the property or person of its citizens. And if not, certainly no such obligation as is suggested would be imposed.
> The case cannot be otherwise in regard to the Territories, unless the expenses have been incurred by authority of the United States. The duty of protecting its citizens rests primarily with the State, and it is not perceived that under circumstances such as are supposed that duty could be devolved upon the United States.

I have reproduced these reports not because I concur in their conclusions, but that the claimants enumerated in Executive Document No. 65, and all others who are looking to Congress to reimburse them for their losses at the hands of the Indians, may know the line of reasoning used in both Houses and the declared opposition to the payment of their claims notwithstanding the provision for presentation so clearly made in the act of May 29, 1872.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] if, in the face of these adverse reports, Congress has allowed any of the claims recently presented for losses at the hands of Indians?

Mr. MCCORMICK. None; and I am informed that the Committee on Claims, to whom they have been referred, has decided not to make a favorable report upon any.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will ask the gentleman another question if he will pardon the interruption. That is, whether he knows of the payment of any claims of this class heretofore?

Mr. MCCORMICK. Yes, sir; many such claims were paid under the act of 1834, and, indeed, up to the date of the act of 1872 they were frequently paid by Congress when not taken from the annuities.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Did not the Government pay Cooper & Co. for loss of stock on the Platte River in 1854 through a raid made by the Sioux and Pawnee tribes? Cooper & Co. were driving stock to California and I think their loss was paid by the Government.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I do not recall the facts relating to that particular case, but it is on record that numerous losses were reimbursed by the Government. Indeed it is only of late years, as the legislation I have referred to shows, that any question as to the liability of the Government where the claimants were not in fault has been raised. In other words, when the Government was young and really unable to protect its citizens upon the border their losses through the Indians were recognized and adjusted, but now that it is older and stronger and abundantly able to afford protection, or to compensate its citizens for losses suffered in the absense of such protection, it is by the action of Congress declared to be unwilling to do so, and the sufferers, not a few of whom (as brave men and good citizens as the country can produce) have been driven to absolute poverty and want through long years of patient waiting, are left wholly without redress.

Even in the settlement of clearly authorized and regular accounts one who has business with the Departments or a claim before Congress is daily and forcibly reminded of the experience of Mr. Mark Twain in connection with the great beef contract of Mr. John Wilson Mackenzie. It will be remembered that after tracing that famous claim through all the Departments, and the sacrifice of a number of valuable lives in fruitless attempts to collect it, the following colloquy ensued between the exhausted Mr. Twain and a Treasury official:

> Where is this John Wilson Mackenzie?
> Dead.
> When did he die?
> He didn't die at all—he was killed.
> How?
> Tomahawked.
> Who tomahawked him?

Why, an Indian, of course. You didn't suppose it was a superintendent of a Sunday-school, did you?
No. An Indian, was it?
The same.
Name of the Indian?
His name! I don't know his name.
Must have his name. Who saw the tomahawking done?
I don't know.
You were not present yourself then?
Which you can see by my hair. I was absent.
Then how do you know that Mackenzie is dead?
Because he certainly died at that time and I have every reason to believe that he has been dead ever since. I know he has, in fact.
We must have proofs. Have you got the Indian?
Of course not.
Well, you must get him. Have you got the tomahawk?
I never thought of such a thing.
You must get the tomahawk. You must produce the Indian and the tomahawk. If Mackenzie's death can be proven by these you can then go before the commission appointed to audit claims with some show of getting your bill under such headway that your children may possibly live to receive the money and enjoy it. But that man's death must be proven.

The humorist's extravagance gives hardly more than a fair illustration of the absurd technicalities insisted upon by some of our Department officers and by some of the committees of Congress in the consideration and adjustment of very simple and proper claims.

Mr. Chairman, during the several terms I have held a seat upon this floor I have discussed the Indian question in nearly every aspect under which it has presented itself to the American people. If I have not dwelt upon this matter of claims for losses suffered by settlers from the Missouri to the Pacific, it has been simply because I have had faith to believe that despite the legislation for the Indian, much of it foolish, partial, and unnecessary, which has been here enacted of late years, a spirit of justice to those of our own kith and kin who have planted our flag upon the frontier would lead at least to the prompt and careful consideration of these claims.

I have not thought that in order to deal fairly with the Indians it is necessary or even excusable to deal harshly with the whites, or by any technicalities of law to relieve the Government from responsibilities which it has heretofore acknowledged or from claims most of which could not have arisen had the frontier enjoyed that measure of protection to which its citizens were entitled, and which, as I have before said upon this floor, I think any other government of strength and standing would have provided. I feel warranted from my personal knowledge in saying that a large proportion of these losses are the direct result of the want of a fixed and definite Indian policy upon the part of the Government and of the cool and inexcusable indifference of Congress to the state of affairs upon the frontier, as repeatedly set forth by petitions from the people, legislative memorials, reports of the Departments, and statements of the press.

The Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] in his impressive speech regarding Indian depredations in Oregon, made in February last, to which I refer those upon this floor who have been so much inclined to excuse, if not to justify, the Modocs in their bloody proceedings, drew a vivid picture of the trials of the settlers in that State and of the inefficiency of the Government through which a little band of savages for months successfully defied all authority and maintained a reign of terror throughout a wide district of country. In conclusion he said, as I may say of the claims to which I have called the attention of the House:

No civil enactment or military order can now be had that can, by relation, go back and give us protection against wrongs already committed. Therefore we seek that just compensation to our injured citizens which rightfully accrues to them by reason of a failure upon the part of the Government to give proper and necessary protection; a compensation which at best is indeed but a sorry recompense for sufferings endured and losses sustained.

Congress should certainly be slow to reject claims for depredations which through its own failure to act, or to authorize action, the savages were emboldened, I may say tempted and encouraged to commit. It will not do to say that because the claims are many of them of long standing, and others exorbitant and the total number large, that they are not entitled to consideration. If the proofs of their correctness, now demanded, are considered insufficient for the protection of the Treasury against imposition, let others be required before payment and let every check and safeguard be provided. But if on the other hand it is the settled judgment of Congress that no liability for losses of property through Indian outrages rests upon the Government, then without further delay or hesitation let it be so announced by positive and unmistakable action by Congress, and let the broad farce of inviting the presentation of claims and their formal reference here by the Department of the Interior no longer be played.

The question, like many affecting the frontier, has been too long neglected if not evaded by Congress, and without saying more upon its merits or attempting arguments which the legal gentlemen of the House are so much better qualified to make, I insist that it is due to the citizens of a large part of our common country, who have an interest in these claims, and who have confidently expected that they would be paid by the Government, that they should be relieved from the degree of anxiety and uncertainty in which they have been kept.

Touching the statement of losses and damage sustained by Indians on account of depredations by whites, which is given in response to my resolution, or to that part of it added by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] I have only to say that the aggregate of $621,053.64 appears chiefly to be made up from claims for property taken by soldiers of both armies from the Indians of Kansas at different periods during the late civil war.

Where any liability can be shown to attach to the Government, and the claims are justly stated, I think they should be paid, or if not, as I have said concerning the claims of the whites, that Congress should by definite legislation and without further delay declare that they will not be recognized and allowed, and thus dispose of them for all time.

Death of Senator Buckingham.

OF CONNECTICUT.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1875.

The House having under consideration the resolution of the Senate in regard to the death of Senator W. A. BUCKINGHAM, of Connecticut—

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The plain, old-fashioned town of Lebanon, Connecticut, will be found at this day very much as the French officers looked at it during one long, dreary winter of the Revolution. There stands the old war office of "Brother Jonathan," as Governor Trumbull, the revolutionary war governor of Connecticut, was popularly called. The comments of the Frenchmen upon country life in Connecticut are amusing even at this day. I hardly suppose they saw in it the beauty and excellence that we perceive. But among those old country roads and those quiet homesteads grew up a body of young men, not familiar with the language of chivalry, not receiving from their parents the charge of the Spartan mother to her sons, but men to whom the word "duty" was everything. The young Trumbull consecrated himself to the ministry, but the demands of his father's business called him into an active mercantile life; and by and by his fellow-citizens called him to a higher sphere of public exertion, and he was governor of the Colony and State for fifteen years commencing with 1769. He was the only governor of a Colony that remained true to his people during the war of the Revolution. Every other colonial governor went with the king. Brother Jonathan stood by his people and they stood by him from the beginning to the end—the square, straight, solid, brave, indomitable old man. His son followed him in the chief magistracy of the State in 1798, keeping the place for eleven years, and in 1858 our good Governor WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM, also a native of Lebanon, took the reins to hold them for eight stormy years.

As my colleague has said, the excellence of his gracious mother was traditional in the town. Doubtless, as my colleague has said, he emulated the example of Brother Jonathan, to whom duty was all in all; and we all have loved to contrast them in their lives. Our two war governors, not dissimilar in many circumstances of their lives, but especially like in this, each with the hearty choice of his fellow-citizens remained at the head of the little Commonwealth during the long great wars of independence, for such I call both wars.

His pastor said of him truly, he was the offspring of New England's purest life; she never gave birth to a nobler son.

I do not know that men would call Governor BUCKINGHAM a great man, but he is like many others who are revered in history. Sometimes men sit down and dissect the character of George Washington and tell us he was not great, but the world persists in remembering him, walking round about his character, pointing out all its virtues and admiring its symmetry and power. So of our lamented friend; I do not know we can call him a great orator or a great writer or great in anything especially, but you can look at no element of his heart or head in which he does not appear excellent. As a son, as a husband, as a father, as a brother and friend, all who knew him speak of him in terms of the most devoted affection and respect. They say there was none like the old governor in all these things, and as he moved among his fellow-citizens his appearance commanded their respect. Strong in his affections, kindly and courteous in his manner, he attracted the love of all about him.

He was an energetic and successful business man. He rose to eminence; he accumulated property but he used it as one who considered himself merely the steward, and as my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has said, he lamented at one time when he found himself growing so rich and immediately began to discharge the duty of a Christian gentleman in bestowing it wisely upon many enterprises.

As a public servant his fidelity, his energy, his patriotism, marked him among public men. He was public-spirited in the broadest sense of the word. We wonder, looking over his life, how he found time to do so much. He seemed always ready to take any new burden upon his shoulders. He never seemed to be discouraged. He never seemed to be overburdened. As the president of a temperance society or at the head of a Bible society, or a tract society, or a missionary society, or attending great public meetings or political conventions, he always came to the front; never failed—always ready, always efficient. He was always among the men at the head of his own church. He was a deacon for thirty years; a man who scarcely ever missed his seat—never if his health permitted. He was leaned upon by the respective pastors. He was a friend of the public schools and of every charity—a ready and cheerful giver; he only wanted to know how much they thought should be his share. He paid cheerfully, not as a tax but as a duty and a privilege. He was the friend of all the young men who ever came near him seeking education. He gave when he could; encouraged them; never turned them away without a kindly word. He was a patient and ready sympathizer and friend of the poor. He was a warm friend of the slave always; and when he came finally to the head of our affairs at the beginning of the rebellion we found our plain, straightforward, well-balanced country gentleman made a great war governor—always cheerful, always brave, always ready, always ahead in business, so that the quota of Connecticut was always in advance of the demands of the Federal Government.

Our troops always went out so well equipped that on reaching the field they were immediately stripped of some of their surplus. Interested in the widows and orphan children of the dead soldiers and urging upon the Legislature the care of them, sending his agents constantly to inspect the condition of our troops, and communicating with them constantly by messengers and by telegrams, from the beginning to the end I do not know what more our Commonwealth could have asked of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM. He never had a doubt of the willingness of the State to stand by him, and never had a doubt of the success of the contest.

His children and his family will remember him. His business associates will remember him. All the late soldiers will remember him. The managers of all our benevolent associations will remember him. His humble neighbors, the poor, will remember his tender words and generous private charities. His church will remember him, and the State will forever cherish his name with those of the good old Governor Trumbull and its truest and strongest leaders. He manifested in his activities and usefulness a strong, clear, and symmetrical character. In studying him I perceive the value of that element which men call character. If men will not call him great in majesty of intellect, they must call him great in goodness, great in the harmony, in the truth, in the firmness, the fidelity of his character—"rich in saving common sense." In speaking of him I think of what the English laureate said in talking of one of England's good and great men:

O good gray head which all men knew;
O steady nerve to all occasions true;
O fall'n at length that tower of strength
Which stood four-square to all the winds that blew.

District 3.65 Bonds.

SPEECH OF HON. S. W. DORSEY,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

March 3, 1875.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the following item:

To pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds issued under the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," $365,000: Provided, That certificates for claims presented and allowed under the sixth section of the act aforesaid shall be presented for conversion, as provided by the seventh section of said act, within ninety days from the passage of this act, and, as to certificates of date subsequent to the passage of this act, within ninety days from the date of such certificate; and if not so presented, the privilege of thus exchanging shall not be exercised by any holder of such claim; and the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia are prohibited from issuing any bonds under the seventh section of the act hereinbefore referred to in exchange for any certificate unless presented within the time herein specified; and the salary of the commissioner of the sinking fund, acting as treasurer thereof, shall be $1,000 per annum—

Mr. DORSEY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In reply to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] who stated that these bonds had been issued to poor people, laborers and contractors, and disposed of by them at ruinous rates, and furthermore that now they were in the hands of speculators who alone would be benefited by their payment in gold, I want to say to the Senator that I have in my hand a letter from the commissioners of the District from which it appears that there has been about $8,000,000 of the indebtedness of this District audited, and less than $3,000,000 of that aggregate sum has been funded in these bonds. The holders of the certificates of indebtedness who were entitled to payment at par, refused to receive these bonds at sixty-eight cents for their certificates, which cost them in most instances ninety cents, and very properly too, I believe. The Committee on the District of Columbia, before whom this matter has been pending for some time, has heard a large number of persons interested in these bonds who furnished the District lumber, materials of all sorts, at low prices or cash prices, in addition to the contractors, and who expected to receive their pay in par bonds and who declined to receive these bonds in lieu of the certificates which they held from the board of public works. The commissioners of the District as well as the sinking-fund commissioners have on three or four occasions recommended the payment of this interest in gold, and it was the understanding I believe when the act was passed last summer providing for funding this debt that the bonds would be payable in gold and would be worth about eighty-five cents. The Comptroller of the Treasury has construed the law otherwise and paid the interest in currency; so that the bonds to-day are at the nominal price of 68. I send to the desk the letter of the commissioners and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1875.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry, we have the honor to send herewith a communication from the board of audit, showing the amount of the indebtedness of the District, audited and certified to the 20th instant, is $7,586,660.37; also a communication from the commissioners of the sinking fund, showing the amount of 3.65 bonds issued to like date is $3,648,200.

In regard to the interest the certificates of the board of audit bear, to which you called our attention, the board is not prepared to give an opinion.

We accompany this note with a copy of an opinion of the Attorney-General relating to the interest on certificates of the auditor of the late board of public works, which does not apply to the matter of interest on certificates of the board of audit, and may be of no importance to your present inquiry.

Permit us to add that we hope Congress will approve your suggestions to us for defining the time within which the certificates of the board of audit may be converted into 3.65 bonds. Ninety days from the date of the certificates seems to us long enough time within which the conversions shall be made.

We inclose also a printed copy of our communication to Congress relative to appropriation for payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds and note of board of audit, to which we invite your attention.

We trust Congress will provide for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds in coin, agreeably to our suggestion in our report of the 5th ultimo, and of the commissioners of the sinking fund in their annual report. This, with the perfecting of the guarantee of the United States, as provided for in the bill which has passed the House of Representatives, will materially advance the market value of the bonds, quoted in to-day's papers at 69½, which is much less, you are aware, than was expected by Congress on the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, which authorized the issuing of the bonds.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
United States Senate.
